When it suspended specie payments, the United States was a nation of thirty-one millions, and had a double standard, with gold as the cheaper metal, and comparatively little silver in circulation. Now when it proposes to resume specie payments it is a nation of forty-five millions, and should have a double standard, with silver as the cheaper metal, and comparatively little gold. It requires a stock of specie of not less than three hundred and fifty millions, accordingly as it shall conclude to establish its standard, whether of gold or silver or both, and with or without qualification, and over or under the average market ratios between the metals. This sum will be more or less in gold or in silver. My own plan is simply that which was the law of this land from 1792 (as amended in 1834) to 1873, namely, the unqualified double standard at 16 for 1. I say unqualified, although since 1853 the fractional coins, halves, quarters, dimes, and half dimes have been debased. I propose no change in these at present. The adoption of this plan, which is to be effected by simply restoring the silver dollar to legal tender and free coinage, would involve the purchase by the Government of from one hundred millions to two hundred millions of dollars of silver wherewith to resume specie payments.

This purchase would, as I believe—and in this I am backed by all experience—have the effect of restoring the market relation of 16 for 1, and thus the market and the legal relation would become the same. The one hundred or two hundred millions thus purchased would take all or nearly all the silver that Germany has left, and would fully counteract the effect upon the market ratio which her attempted change of standard has thus far been chiefly instrumental in producing.

Thus we should start substantially as the Senator from California contends we ought to, at such a legal relation between silver and gold as corresponded, or as would soon correspond, with the market relation; and therefore it will not be necessary, even from his point of view, to change the relation from the old one of 16 for 1 to any other.

As for any apprehension that the product of the silver mines of this country would tend to keep the relation at above 15½ or 16, this is a mere chimera. I showed on a previous occasion that concurrently with the increased product of the Comstock lode there has been a diminished product of less prolific mines, and now I unhesitatingly affirm that in all the United States there are not ten silver mines that are paying expenses, and that in no district outside of the Comstock, which is now being worked at a depth of nineteen hundred feet, is there any profit in silver mining.

For this reason the world's total annual product of silver is actually a trifle less now than it was three years ago and but twice as great as it was a century ago. The total silver product of the world is now but seventy-two millions. It was seventy-six millions in 1873, and over thirty-five millions in 1790.

While silver has been produced in tolerably close correspondence with the world's population and with food and the other principal articles of subsistence, the production of gold has fluctuated enormously. Silver and other commodities have preserved an even relation, and a given quantity of one will exchange for about the same quantity of the other as it would do twenty-five years ago, while gold is becoming dearer in relation to other commodities from day to day.

The Senator's third proposition is that "all forms of currency in use at any given time ought to be equivalent in value." To this proposition I assent; and I say more, that you cannot make them differ; for so soon as they differ, all but one of them, the cheapest, will cease to be current. An objection has been made that with the re-instatement of the silver dollar we should have three kinds of dollars in circulation of different values, each of them a legal tender for any amount, and that utter confusion in our monetary system would be the result. Such a conclusion is unwarranted, because the predicate is impossible. As fast as the silver dollar is coined and issued it will take the place of the paper dollar, and as between the silver and gold dollar the cheaper one will be used exclusively as a means of payment. Therefore only one will be employed, and no confusion could result.

The fourth proposition of the Senator from California is that "gold by the common consent of the commercial world is the ultimate standard by which all values are measured." The Senator will, I think, pardon me if I say that this is a mere assumption without even the appearance of evidence to prove it. Gold is not the common standard of the commercial world, nor has it ever been, nor is it likely ever to be so. Gold is not mined; it is picked up. It is chiefly the product of placers. Its annual production varies even of late from one hundred and ninety-four millions a year in 1852 to ninety-seven millions a year in 1875. The entire stock on hand in the world scarcely exceeds that of silver. As a measure of value it lacks the stability, steadiness, and universal distribution of silver. Ten years ago 100 grains of it scarcely purchased a day's labor of a mechanic in this country. Now 50 grains or less will purchase that amount of labor. It is the same with commodities, and commodities not only in this country but all over the commercial world. While the gentleman is proclaiming gold to be a universal measure of value, the prices of commodities in gold throughout such portions of the commercial world where gold is employed as the standard, are rapidly falling, and bankruptcy and ruin stare the merchant in the face.

Where silver is employed this is not the case. The cries of distress which this condition of affairs produces appear to be unheard by the Senator; but, like Pharaoh of old, the progress of events will compel him at length to listen to the counsel of reason.

That portion of the question which we are now considering, the part which relates to resumption in specie, must not be decided by the light of the past, for in the past the credit system had not become so extended as it is now. Credit has advanced with the security afforded by freedom and an impartial administration of justice. Less than a century ago almost the entire population of Europe were serfs, while judicial systems had scarcely more than taken form. Even fifty years ago a proposition to appreciate the standard would have but little affected the public interest; while now it threatens the entire relations of society. There was scarcely any international debt at that time, but little public debt, and no great amount of private debt. The corporate system was in its birth, and great corporations and corporative debts were almost unknown. To increase the weight of debt by enhancing the standard was never so serious a question as it is now, and the country will weigh our deliberations on this topic with a criticism which is sharpened by the gravest apprehensions.

With the advance which society has made during the past century there have come into the arena of financial questions considerations which were so foreign to them a century ago that when Adam Smith wrote his Wealth of Nations he gave no place to them in his book, but published a separate work on these considerations. The moral qualities had then no commercial standing. There was no market value to enterprise, perseverance, integrity, frugality, and virtue. Now they are quoted in the mercantile-agency reports to the finesse of fractions. The credit system has grown up in their sunshine, and upon this system rest the most important institutions of modern society. Yet this system you coldly propose to destroy by chaining it to a single metal, already monopolized and scarce, whose production is governed by chance and whose annual yield is diminishing. Should you effect this rash and ill-considered purpose, who would care hereafter to trust or to be trusted, to give credit or to ask for it? What would become of long leases, long bonds, or any permanent form of credit? Who would bargain to borrow dollars or to get into debt for dollars, when their value might be doubled within a few years? Nobody. The credit system would crumble to the dust and the great moral qualities which have built it up would perish with it for want of recognition and reward. The miser would again hug his gold, and the bold inventor and adventurer would languish for want of capital to carry out his ideas or recompense his efforts.

The Senator here leaves the subject of specie payments and ingeniously and ably expounds the merits of a credit currency based upon interconvertible bonds, with occasional glimpses of ultimate gold redemption, like a dissolving view, in the distance. This, with but slight surface variation, is an old scheme of credit, which has been tried in various forms in most of the countries of the world, and which, from inherent weakness, has invariably failed.

I am opposed to it and all other schemes for manufacturing money out of any material which would not be equally as valuable in the market, whether it had the Government stamp on it or not.

In advocating the restoration of silver to the standard I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not in favor of any debased coinage, neither is any one who has spoken or written in favor of bimetallic money. The money we propose to use is to be worth as coin no more than it is worth as bullion, excepting of course the slight cost of its manufacture. I advocate no violation of contracts; no interference with bargains; no raising or lowering of prices; no advantage to debtor or creditor. My judgment is opposed to all fiat paper money and all debased subsidiary metal money, unless the duty of redemption in full-weighted money is coupled with the authority to issue it. I believe in the necessity and advantage of using both the metals, silver and gold, as money. I believe in the right of any person to have his bullion, whether of gold or silver, coined at the national mints, at cost price, and returned to him in as many coins as can be made out of it. I believe in the propriety and advantage of unlimited legal tenders in regard to any and all of these coins, so long as they remain of full weight within the mint allowance of remedy. I believe that the day of seigniorage and royalties has passed, and that the money of this country, like its institutions, ought to be free.

I do not propose any benefit for myself or for the gold and silver miners, or for any class of persons or corporations or things.

I propose simply that the Government, which has wisely reserved to itself the monopoly of coinage, shall conduct that monopoly in the interest of the people who authorized it, and by supplying them at the cost of manufacture with all the coins for which they deposit bullion, weight for weight.

The plan I would adopt has no limitations or restrictions about it; no artificial arrangements; no bounds, rivets, straps, or ligatures. It is the plan of simplicity and of justice; justice to ourselves; justice to debtor and creditor; justice to all the world.

It is precisely the system which prevailed in this country from 1792 to 1853; a system which everybody understood and under which the United States grew and prospered from three millions to twenty-five millions of people, wealthy and powerful. It gives value for value, equivalent for equivalent, weight for weight. That is all there is about it.

And right here it may not be out of place to reply to those who have imputed my advocacy of a return to the double standard to unworthy motives, to my interests in silver-mining.

The silver mines of Western Nevada yield almost as much gold as silver; in fact, the ore contains about 45 per cent. of gold to 55 per cent. of silver. Hence those interested in them would, by the adoption of the double standard, make on the one hand but little more than they would lose on the other.

My own pecuniary interests in mines which yield gold to the entire exclusion of silver is far greater than my interests in silver mines, and consequently in advocating a return to the bimetallic standard I am really arguing against, instead of for, my own interests. None but those who are strangers to me have ever made the vulgar imputation. Yet, were it true, it could not weaken the force of the argument; for the interests of an individual and the public may be, and often are, identical. But it is not true, nor could it be true.

The man who accepts a position of public trust and uses it either directly or indirectly for his own personal advantage, who subordinates public duty to private interests, who sells honor for profit, immediate or contingent, commits a crime so base and despicable that our language has no fitting name for it. Contrasted with it, bold theft becomes respectable and open treason honorable; and whenever such an offense has been committed and the offender discovered, whether he be intrenched in powerful position or endowed with brilliant talents, if the country does not blast the offense and the offender with the mildew of its scorn, then indeed are our institutions in peril, greater peril than they could be subjected to from armed foes, however powerful, whether foreign or domestic.

I now turn to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Vermont. He began by quoting from my speech of April, 1874, in favor of resuming specie payments and against further continuance of our present irredeemable paper system, and appeared to suppose that he furnished an irresistible argument against the restoration of the bimetallic standard when he quoted me as preferring gold to paper money some two years ago.

By what process of reasoning the Senator arrived at such a conclusion I am at a loss to conceive. I just as much prefer gold money to paper money to-day as I did two years ago, but that does not prevent me from also preferring in an equal degree silver money to paper. It has all the advantages that gold has and some that gold has not. The annual addition to the world's stock of silver is regular and moderate, because silver is the product of organized and competitive labor. The annual addition to the world's stock of gold is irregular, and, at the present time, insufficient. This irregularity and insufficiency result from the hap hazard nature of gold mining, which is chiefly in placers.

When I used the word "gold" in the speech referred to I used it as a generic term, meaning the precious metals, gold and silver, which I thought then and think now, and which the experience of the ages has demonstrated to be, the fittest material for the money of the world. I was not aware that the valuable option which the country had always enjoyed of using either gold or silver as unlimited legal tender had been abolished by the mint law of 1873.

If the Senator who deems it essential to the merits of this question to ascertain whether my views upon the subject have always been consistent will simply substitute the words "precious metals" for the word "gold" in my speech of 1874 I think he will find nothing to carp at. Not that I regard a man's consistency as a just criterion of the soundness of his latest views, for it is better to be right, even though once wrong, than to remain wrong for fear of the charge of inconsistency. But such a charge has but narrow ground to stand upon when it rests only upon the use of the term "gold" in the place of "precious metals."

Addressing himself to the merits of the bill before us, the Senator characterizes the dollar of 1792, which he appears to erroneously suppose was originated in 1837, as "a degraded dollar," and that its further coinage would "revolutionize the policy and traditions of the American people."

This is very extraordinary language from one who was a member of the legislative body which suppressed the coinage of that dollar only three years ago and after it had been in continuous use in this country, not merely since 1792, but from the time of the conquest of Mexico by Hernando Cortez;* for the American silver dollar of 1792 was the same in weight of pure metal as the Spanish dollar and was copied after that coin by Alexander Hamilton, who had a number of Spanish dollars, as he found them in circulation, assayed for that purpose.

It is only necessary to state the motive with which Hamilton caused this assay to be made and the Spanish dollar to be adopted into our coinage system in order to illustrate the wildness of the Senator's language. It was simply this: The Spanish dollar, averaging, as found in circulation here, about 371¼ grains of pure metal, was the coin in which all contracts were made in America. Previous to 1728 the Spanish dollar contained, according to law, 389.4 grains of fine silver, with a remedy of 2 to 3 grains per dollar, the actual range of newly minted coins being 386¼ to 387¼ grains fine. Those weighed by Newton in 1717 yielded 386¾ grains fine. In 1728 the Spanish dollar was reduced by law to 383.2 grains fine. In 1772 it was reduced to 374¼ grains fine, with a remedy of 1 grain.

In 1786 the Congress of the American Confederation adopted the dollar as a unit of money of account and fixed its valve at 375.64 grains fine; but no actual dollars were coined and none used except Spanish dollars.

In 1792 the Congress of the United States adopted and coined a silver dollar of 371¼ grains fine, and this dollar remained unchanged until to-day, or, practically, until its coinage was forbidden by its omission from the revised mint code of 1873. It, however, remained as it had always been an unlimited legal tender until 1874, when this attribute was destroyed by its erroneous inclusion among subsidiary silver coins limited to a five dollar legal tender in the Revised Statutes. The weight of this dollar was derived from a number of the Spanish dollars in circulation in 1792. The average of these as assayed by Alexander Hamilton was found to be 371 grains, to which Hamilton added one-fourth of a grain to make sure of its being of full average weight. The gold dollar of account was made exactly one-fifteenth of this weight. As Spanish silver dollars were the only money in the United States at the time of the passage of this act, and it was desirable to retain them in circulation for some time after, (they were in fact so retained until 1853,) it was necessary to weight the American silver dollar exactly even with the Spanish dollars in circulation. Had the American silver dollar been made of full weight with newly-coined Spanish silver dollars, to wit, 374¼ grains pure, they would have been melted up and Spanish dollars, slightly abraded, would have usurped their place. Had they been made of less weight than the circulating Spanish dollar the latter would have been driven out of the country, a catastrophe which at that time we could not afford to sustain. They were therefore made to conform to the actual dollar in circulation, the dollar in which all contracts had been made. It was the dollar of Charles V; it was the dollar of the Conquest; it was the dollar of the early colonial establishments; it was the dollar of the Revolution; it was the dollar of the Confederation; it became the dollar of the Union, and it is the dollar of to-day's Centennial, except that by the act of 1873 no new coins of this denomination can be manufactured at the mint and that, through an outrageous blunder of the revisers of the statutes in 1874, it cannot be legally tendered for more than $5. It is these two pernicious restrictions upon the use of the silver dollar that we are attempting to remove; and yet this is the dollar which the Senator stigmatizes as "degraded," and this the attempt which he characterizes as "revolutionary." It is difficult to imagine a more violent misapplication of terms.

What is there about 371¼ grains of pure silver which is "degraded?" What is there degraded or degrading in the employment of this quantity of metal to discharge a debt of one dollar, or a million times this quantity to discharge a debt of a million dollars if it equitably and fairly measures the debt due? What is there revolutionary in restoring to our laws provisions of which they were deprived by indirection and without public discussion? Is it believed that, were these provisions of law restored, a man who owed, for example, a thousand dollars in greenbacks would get the better of his creditor by offering to pay him with a thousand silver dollars or a Government certificate of deposit for that amount? Is it supposed that any creditor would object to being paid in silver dollars instead of currency dollars a debt contracted on the currency basis? Of course he would not; for the one is to-day the equivalent of the other. The Senator urges a country now groaning under a heavy burden of debt (aside from the national debt) which is counted in dollars, to choose the scarcest and most costly dollar, a dollar which would give the creditor 15 per cent. more than his just due and punish the debtor in the same proportion, instead of the cheaper silver dollar, which would to-day accurately measure and serve as the equivalent of each dollar of indebtedness in this land. What have the debtors of this country been guilty of, that all the inconveniences and burdens of a return to specie payments should be imposed on them alone?

The fallacy of assuming that the present recent and temporary ratio between the metals of nearly 18 instead of the long-time relation of 15½ would continue after the return of this country to specie payments, is to be found not only in the speech of the Senator from Vermont; it vitiates the arguments of all those who, directly or indirectly, have advocated the single gold standard. They all admit that the demonetization of one hundred or two hundred million ounces of silver and their substitution by an equivalent of gold in Germany has chiefly, if not entirely, caused the recent rise in gold from 15½ to 18 of silver. But at the same time they wholly fail to perceive that the adoption by the United States of the bi-metallic standard at such a ratio as will for a time insure the employment of silver to the substantial exclusion of gold would have the tendency, if not the effect, to cause gold to fall again to its normal ratio of 15½.

That such would be the case, it is impossible to doubt. We have not only the experience of the recent rise in gold upon which to base this expectation; we have also many other similar experiences, and notably the one occasioned by the adoption of the single gold standard by England in 1816, and her purchases of gold for the purpose of resuming specie payments in 1821.

These purchases caused gold to rise in the markets of the world in the course of a few years from its normal ratio of 15½ to that of 16. Instead of waiting for this abnormal and temporary rise to subside, as it would inevitably have done—for 15½ and not 16 is the relative cost of the production of gold to silver—our legislators of 1834 changed the legal ratio of the metals to 16. They did this not by increasing the weight of the silver dollar—that has never been changed during the entire history of our country—but by diminishing the weight of the gold one.

Whether this legislation was accomplished in consequence of looking at the question—as I fear some of us are now disposed to do—too narrowly, or because it was supposed that the British demand for gold would continue indefinitely, it is not necessary at this time to inquire. The point is now to ascertain what effect this undervaluation of silver had upon the markets of the world. The effect was not great, for our population then composed but a small part of the civilized world, and the undervaluation was so moderate that our silver stock was melted up quite gradually. But, though small, the effect was the same as in all similar cases. This was a temporary fall in the rejected metal and a temporary rise in the preferred one.

Yet although the effect upon the world generally was but small, upon this country alone it was considerable. The loss of this silver was one, and not the least, of those causes to which can be traced the financial troubles of that period. Gold is too valuable a metal to be coined into pieces smaller than half or quarter eagles, therefore the adoption of a ratio at which silver was undervalued was tantamount to a premium on the issue of small and fractional bank-notes. Such was the importance of obtaining small monetary units that people no longer looked carefully to the resources of the individuals and banks which furnished them, and the wild-cat system flourished throughout the land. In England the emission of small notes is put down with a strong hand, but there never was, and probably will never be, a hand strong enough to put it down in this country. Hence in 1834 commenced that vast issue of notes by private banks, and the united power of these institutions soon became so great that they attempted to monopolize the entire circulation of the country, and with that view conspired to overthrow the National Bank, and succeeded. Upon the removal of this last restraint upon the recklessness of their operations their emissions were rapidly increased, until from ninety millions in 1834 they rose to one hundred and forty-nine millions in 1837. The country was flooded with irredeemable paper and involved in the wildest speculations. Its stock of silver having been banished through undervaluation, and the meager stock of gold which had come in to take its place being insufficient to keep intact the banks of that mighty channel through which the circulation swept, the stream overflowed and submerged the country in universal bankruptcy.

The effects of the tremendous convulsion of 1837 lasted until the fortunate discovery of gold in California relieved the dearth of metal, and are not entirely effaced even at this distant day. That in no small degree this convulsion had its origin in that mistaken legislation which undervalued and banished silver from the country, there can be no doubt whatever.

And yet if we pass the bill before us without an amendment restoring the silver dollar as an unlimited legal tender at 15½ or 16 to 1 and with free coinage at cost of manufacture, our legislation will be as mistaken as, nay, far more mistaken than, that of 1834. We shall commit a similar error if we pass the amendment proposed by my friend from Vermont, namely, one requiring the silver dollar to consist of 467.8 grains of standard or 421 grains of pure silver. This would be at the rate of more than 18 of silver for 1 of gold. A silver dollar so heavy and valuable as this would not circulate even now, and the Senator from Vermont well knows it. It would go into the melting-pot. Much less will it circulate when, as an experience of nearly three hundred years fully assures us, gold shall have subsided to its normal market relation to silver.

The object of the Senator's proposed amendment is, therefore, to force the resumption of specie payment in gold dollars and to defeat the effort now being made to resume in silver.

I trust that the Senate will vote down the amendment, or any other which proposes to put more than sixteen times the weight of metal in a silver dollar than into a gold one. As for the proposition to make silver bullion a legal tender at its market value in gold, which is embodied in a bill now before the Senate, I trust that it will be voted down also. It will afford no relief whatever to the country. You might as well make wheat or certificates of deposit therefor a legal tender at its market price in gold. It needs no legislation to effect this object. Every commodity is already, in effect, a legal tender at its market price. It is the increasing dearth of gold which renders these market prices so low as to endanger the solvency of the country that it is desirable to mitigate, and this can only be done by restoring silver to the currency at such a ratio to gold as will enable us to temporarily and partially dispense with the latter. As to this ratio, it is my opinion, and in this I am supported in various communications which I have received from distinguished bimetallists in France and England, that even 16 to 1 is too high. The ratio should be 15½ to 1. But I am an advocate of the silver dollar as it stood previous to its late almost magical disappearance from our statute-books. I advocate it not so much because it is the dollar in which we have the option of paying our bonded debt, as because with it the obligations, contracts, and debts between the citizens of this country, amounting to thousands of millions of dollars, can be accurately adjusted and equitably settled.

The Senator from Vermont argues that we shall be just as able to resume payments in gold in 1879 as we were in 1843, when, as he says, "we had less gold than in 1837." In this conclusion I am happy to be able to agree with him, though perhaps not precisely in the same sense. I believe that if it ever takes place at all, the resumption of payments in gold dollars of the present weight will take place in precisely the same way that it did in 1843. We first repudiated nearly all the debts we owed, and then resumed in gold, even, as the Senator says, "with less gold than we had in 1837."

This honorable achievement, which has left a stain upon the escutcheons of some of the foremost States of this Union, would in my opinion be repeated, would have to be repeated, were we to attempt to resume specie payments in gold dollars of the present weight. There are already in existence in several States of this Union organized parties who openly advocate stay-laws for private debts and open repudiation for public ones, and dangerous heresies involving further issues of paper money are gaining ground all over the land.

Addressing himself more immediately to the provisions of the pending bill, the Senator argues that if the Government does not limit its emissions of the silver for which the bill provides and which it limits to a tender of $20, the Government may redeem with it such a quantity of greenbacks that the emission of silver may be "illimitable" and the country may be "flooded" with it; a result which the Senator appears to regard with great apprehension.

Now, it does not seem clear to me that if there are but three hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks afloat the emission of silver coins to redeem them can be "illimitable," seeing that even three hundred and fifty millions is a limited and not an illimitable sum. Nor does it seem clear to me how the country can be "flooded" with these silver tokens if the paper tokens which they are to replace do not flood the country now; nor if, as the Senator avers, the silver bullion for these tokens can now be bought for even dollars in greenbacks, can I understand how the country can lose anything by afterward redeeming the greenbacks with the silver tokens.

The Senator denies that there are any of our former silver dollars now in circulation; but in this, as I am informed, he is hardly correct. It has been stated that there are some $20,000 in silver dollars now in the Treasury, and I am credibly advised that there are plenty of them doing duty at Philadelphia, Louisville, and elsewhere, in the payment of ground-rents, certain of which the courts have very properly decided can only be discharged in these coins. In addition, there are said to be considerable numbers circulating in South America, China, &c. It is true that the whole amount in circulation in this country is comparatively small; but what of it? Are there any gold dollars in circulation? We all know that, with the exception of a few which are paid into the custom-houses, these little coins are so scarce as to have become almost obsolete. Does not this fact furnish as strong ground for an argument to degrade or interdict the gold dollar as the other does to degrade or interdict the silver dollar?

The Senator alludes at some length to the public debt, the "dishonesty" of proposing to pay it in silver dollars, the danger of inviting it home "in ship loads to be sold for whatever it would bring"—as though it was ever sold for any more—the peril of our not being able to fund it at a lower rate of interest, and so forth. All of this I pass over, because if our public debt is not now and has not always been payable in silver dollars of 371¼ grains pure, then the amendment which I support does not apply to the subject.

The Senator quotes from the British mint report of 1871 to prove that the "chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] was mistaken if he intended to claim that an unlimited double standard existed in England." England abolished the double standard sixty years ago, and the world has never ceased to be reminded of the fact by the continual perturbations in monetary affairs which it occasions.

Passing over the Senator's account of the latest of these perturbations, namely, the recent coinage movements and regulations in Germany, and the Latin union, I come upon this statement in his speech:

> Since 1870 the price [of silver] in London, the great market for silver, has varied from 60d. per ounce to 52d., or nearly 16 per cent., which is actually more than the variation, during the same period, of our paper money."

The pence in which the Senator's quotations are expressed are standard gold. Now, suppose that instead of quoting the price of silver in standard gold, he had quoted the price of gold in standard silver, let us see how the paragraph would read:

"Since 1870 the price [of gold] in London, the great market for gold, has varied nearly 16 per cent., which is infinitely more than the variation, during the same period, of our paper money," which in silver, during the period mentioned, has scarcely varied at all.

To quote the prices of gold in silver for the purpose of showing a variation in the relative value of the two metals is as correct and fair as to quote the prices of silver in gold. Neither of them is correct. The only way to ascertain which metal has altered is to measure them in some third commodity. If this be done, it will be found that silver has not fallen at all; but that, on the contrary, gold has risen. By the other method, which is not argument at all but a mere trick of quotations, one is led to suppose that gold is absolutely immovable, while all other commodities, silver included, are subject to the most violent fluctuations. By the true method, which is argument, it will be found that all commodities fluctuate in value; but silver among the least of all.

As to the Senator's estimates of the future silver product of the United States and Mexico, I can only say that I have not been able to find support for them either in books, official reports, or from my own private information. They appear to me loose, excessive, and misleading. They ignore the fact that while the product has increased in this country, it has fallen off in others; that while it has increased in some mines, it has fallen off in others; and that the successful exploration of the Bonanza mines has been concurrent with the abandonment and closure of numerous others which previously yielded a large amount of silver. This fact the Senator himself inferentially admits in another part of his speech.

Yet to strengthen his excessive estimates of this product the Senator claims that "notwithstanding the recent enormous yields of the gold-fields of California and Australia" silver has fallen in ratio to gold from 15.7 in 1849 to 18.13 at the present time. My reply to this statement is that there has been no "recent enormous yield of gold." On the contrary, the annual gold product of the world has fallen off from over one hundred and ninety millions in 1852 to scarcely one-half this sum in 1875; and it is to other causes than the vicissitudes of mining that we must look for the recent change in the long-standing ratio between the metals.

The Senator has placed the ladder of resumption in an elevator. He would now set the country to work toiling and sweating up its rounds in the vain hope of reaching the parlor floor, which is carpeted with gold. The case is worse than that of Sisyphus, whose arid hill-side was at least stationary. But my friend's elevator has the peculiar property of descending the moment anybody attempts to climb his ladder, and of descending faster than the climber can climb. The inevitable result will be that the toiler will soon find himself in the basement of bankruptcy.

I must also demur to the Senator's sweeping implication that less silver is used in the arts now than formerly, or, as he puts it, when "barbaric displays" were wont to be made of silver dishes.

In his testimony before the British parliamentary committee now sitting in England, on this very subject, Mr. Ernest Seyd, a technically qualified authority on the subject, estimated the annual consumption of silver in the arts at 2,000,000 ounces in England alone, at or about two and a half million ounces in France, at somewhat under 2,000,000 ounces in Germany, and at some 10,000,000 ounces for all Europe. Add to these an allowance for North, South, and Central Americas, in all of which portions of the world, silver, in proportion to population, is more commonly employed in the arts than in Europe, and an allowance for Asia, Africa, and Australia, and the estimate would approximate the figures of Wolowski and other authorities on the subject, who reckon the consumption in the arts throughout the world at one-half the entire product, or about 36,000,000 million ounces.

If the days of "barbaric displays" of silver dishes carry us back to the year 1829, they occurred during a period when the entire silver product of the world was, according to McCulloch, less than one-half the amount which, as above shown, is now used up in the arts alone. Indeed, the consumption of silver in the arts at the present time nearly equals the whole product of the world at so late a date as 1861, when, according to the Journal des Économistes, the entire silver product of the world was but $425,000,000 per annum.

In the face of these facts I am at a loss to understand upon what authority or information the Senator relies for his inference that the consumption of silver in the arts has fallen off.

Recurring to the production of silver he avers that "the Consolidated Virginia mine produces $3,600,000 of silver and gold in one month, at a cost, as reported, of only $300,000," and argues that "other mines of silver must close up or the price of silver must fall."

The idea which the Senator seems to convey in this passage—though he really does not say so—is that the Consolidated Virginia is a great silver mine which produces 12 of result for 1 of investment, and that consequently the price of silver must fall.

In the first place, it does not follow that, because a particular mine yields $12 for $1 in current expenses, the market value of its product will fall. In such a calculation the capital invested, the capital sunk in other similar enterprises where the product failed entirely, the demand for consumption, and many other elements are necessary factors. The price is the average cost of producing silver everywhere.

Such prizes as the Consolidated Virginia Company has been fortunate enough to find have lured on to their ruin thousands of mining companies, which, after expending years of effort and millions of capital in a vain search for similar deposits, have been obliged to abandon their enterprises; and this is continually going on and forms a part of the history of mining. It is through explorations of this character that at rare intervals a bonanza is discovered. Hence the capital sunk in unsuccessful prospecting adventures must be considered as much a part of the cost of the production of the precious metals as the capital which represents the current expenses of a successful mine.

The Senator's statement that the yield of the Consolidated Virginia mine for a single month was $3,600,000 and the cost of production $300,000 would inferentially lead to the belief that this great yield was almost, if not entirely, of silver. True, he refers to the yield as one of gold and silver, but he slurs over the word gold and dwells with emphasis upon the word silver. He evidently cites this example to prove that a commodity whose cost of production is but 10 per cent. of its market price must rapidly decline in value, until market price and cost price closely approximate each other. If the yield were entirely of silver, the argument would be narrow which drew the facts to support it from the history of the operations of a single mine in a single month. But what sort of a point is it that he makes against the stability of value in silver, in the presence of the fact that nearly half of this great yield was of gold, produced, of course, with as little cost as was the silver. His argument commences with being specious and ends with being illogical. It either proves nothing, or it proves too much.

The Senator's speech contains a great number of statements and deductions which he has not fortified with proper authority. I shall therefore simply repeat a few of them, rapidly commenting on each as it comes under review. He says:

> European nations shaking off their heavy loads of silver coin. * * * A diminishing market in India; diminishing ever since it was gorged by the influx of silver arising from the cotton famine in England.
> I would not put a Government stamp upon silver and say that it should be a legal tender at a price 10 per cent. above its real value.
> This measure—the bill before the Senate—would also be a great wrong upon the laboring-men of the country. They are impatiently waiting for a return to specie payments.
> Being 10 or 12 per cent. below gold the laborer would suffer—by being paid in silver—to that extent. If he still owed a mortgage on his house or farm it would have to be paid in gold, but his $20 of wages would be paid in silver. * * * The evils of inflation would remain in full force and to the same extent. * * * By starting a legal tender of silver dollars at 10 or 12 per cent. below the standard of gold, gold must either be debased or be hustled out of the country. The survival not of the fittest but of the poorest only is possible under the laws of trade.

Silver may answer for the currency of countries having little home trade and less foreign commerce, but will not answer for the large trade of enterprising peoples, nor of nations competing for high positions in all the markets of the world. Silver is insufficient and inappropriate for the American people or for the United States.

These extracts are all from the Senator's speech. They can be answered in a few words. If European nations are shaking off their heavy load of silver, they are also shaking off prosperity with it, and will eventually have to buy it back, but can never do so at the price they are selling it for. In fact, there is not nearly enough silver in Europe to redeem the inconvertible paper afloat. Nor is India gorged with it, for labor commands there but a few pence per day. A small rise in general prices in that country, which is inevitable, will absorb all the surplus silver. As soon as this is accomplished India bills will again command a premium in gold in London.

The laboring-man instead of losing will profit by a resumption in silver, in that he would receive a stable value-money instead of credit-money for his services. The value of his labor and the silver dollar would readily adjust themselves to each other. He could pay the mortgage on his house in silver dollars, which would accurately and equitably measure the value of the dollar the mortgage called for; but in case of resumption in gold everything else but the mortgage on his house would shrink in value and it would become too heavy for him to raise, and the mortgage would be canceled by a sheriff's deed.

With a double standard we should have a double lack of uniformity, with oscillations hither and thither, and ever fitfully sinking to the lowest point of either one or the other of the competing metals.

With a double standard there would be no oscillations tending downward; and instead of a double lack of uniformity, there would be a double security for stability. For it is to be borne in mind and is a fact of vital consequence to this discussion, a fact which seems to have been overlooked by all writers on this subject, that the oscillations in the price of the two metals, their change in relative value, is not occasioned by a decline in the one metal, but by an advance in the other. This advance is of a spasmodic character, and is caused, not by the inadequate current production of the advancing metal—for any change from this cause is of slow growth—but by the sudden demand of some particular country in times of overtrading, speculation, and panic; some country which exclusively uses such metal as money. It was this kind of a demand which in this country in the panic of 1873 caused greenbacks to command a premium over bank-notes, and, notwithstanding that the business outlook was never more gloomy, caused them to approximate more nearly to a parity with gold than they had done for years in the most prosperous times. When one of her periodical panics sweeps over England, gold goes to a premium over silver, which in such times is of no use to her. So in Austria, when she is overtaken by a financial storm, silver is in great demand and commands a premium over gold, because silver is Austria's sole debt-paying commodity. In neither case does the other metal decline in value, but bears the same relation to general commodities as before.

The countries wise enough to base their financial systems on the double standard always retain the stationary metal; the metal which accurately and equitably measures the obligations between men by an exchange for it of the other and temporary dearer metal at a profit to themselves. The history of monetary panics show that such panics are more severe and of much longer duration in single and especially gold standard countries than in countries of the double standard. The reason for this is apparent. In the one case only one-half of the world's stock of precious metals can be drawn on for relief; and in the other case, the whole. The only exception that can arise to this rule governing the change of the relations of the metals is when a country unwisely demonetizes one of the metals and sells it for less than its cost to them or its cost of production. This is what Germany is now attempting to do; and therefore gold has temporarily risen in the same proportion that silver has fallen. Such a derangement in the relation of the metals can only be temporary. The cost of production must govern the relation; and when changes in the standard of countries have ceased to operate by reason of the absorption of their surplus stock and its consumption in the arts, the old-time relation must of necessity be restored. In the mean time it is profitable for other countries to adopt the discarded metal, for it is then cheaper than it can be produced or than it is likely to be again.

The Senator says:

It has been argued that a double standard of gold and silver will prevent oscillations.

The Senator will, I trust, pardon me if I doubt that such an argument has ever been made. The argument is not that the double standard will prevent oscillations, but that, like the combination of two different metals in the balance-wheel of a watch, it will lessen them. Far more important than this, however, is the merit it possesses of utilizing as money the entire stock of coin in the world, which even then is so inadequate to the requirements of industry that it has to be eked out with every form, safe and unsafe, of negotiable paper, in order that exchanges may be made and such prices maintained as will permit an equitable settlement between debtor and creditor.

The Senator avers that Hamilton made a mistake of fact in putting but 371¼ grains of pure silver in the dollar instead of 377¼ grains. If the Senator will consult our official documents upon this subject he will find that Hamilton made no mistake at all. His very proper object, as he himself expressed it, was to coin a dollar of the same weight of pure silver as the Spanish dollar then circulating in this country, because it was in this dollar that all our contracts had been made. To ascertain this weight he caused a number of Spanish dollars, then current, to be assayed, and found them to contain on the average about 371¼ grains pure. It was for this reason that he recommended the American dollar to be coined of this weight. Had he put any more silver into it he would have committed precisely the same error which the distinguished Senator from Vermont now advises. The country was in debt then as it is now. Hamilton desired that this debt should be paid to the full and honorably. To accomplish this purpose he did not deem it necessary to pay it in dollars containing each of them any more silver than could be purchased by the current dollar of the day. He thought it sufficient if the new dollar contained exactly as much metal as the current dollar could purchase; and this was the course pursued. And mark the result. Instead of earning for the country the violent reproaches of dishonor, repudiation, violation of contracts, &c., which the Senator would heap upon a similar measure at the present time, it strengthened its credit and gave it a high place among borrowing nations.

The Senator next alludes to the fact that the American gold eagle, which was established in 1792 at 270 grains standard, was reduced in 1834 to 258 grains standard; he avers that the change was made chiefly to obviate the rise or fall of one or the other of the precious metals, and he concludes that therefore—

A double legal tender standard of coins cannot circulate together and be interchangeable unless at the time of equal intrinsic value, except in the case of limited coinage of small denominations required for change.

The whole of this argument is confused and illogical. When any portion of a coinage is limited, the system of coinage cannot be one of a double standard. The double standard involves a fixed relation between silver and gold, both of which may be coined illimitably and of any demominations required by those who present the bullion at the mints. If the market value and the legal relation coincide, there will be no advantage in tendering coins of one metal for debt over coins of the other. In case they do not coincide the debtor will, of course, choose coins of the cheaper metal in paying, as he had to receive the cheaper when he borrowed. This is the option which, up to 1816, or rather 1821, existed in all the countries of the Western world, and up to within the last few years in all those countries except England, and that Mr. Dupont-White held in view when he exclaimed that Columbus had brought from across the Atlantic the means of liberating the masses of Europe from the thralldom of feudalism. It is not claimed that an exact coincidence between the legal and market relations of the metals can always be maintained; but it is claimed that if the legal relation be fixed at an average, covering a long period of years, the closest approximation to equity between debtor and creditor will be attained. First one and then the other metal will be used; now in one and then in the other country; and the prices of commodities and services will be measured, not by the total of one stock, but by the total of both stocks of metals.

The universal adoption of the single gold standard, which by precept and example you are advocating, would cause such a depreciation in the prices of commodities and services as would break up all the relations of society, bankrupt nations, and impoverish debtors throughout the world.

Recurring now to the Senator's allusion to the reduction of the gold eagle in 1834, does this fact not furnish the strongest evidence that it was and has been and is the silver dollar which is the measure of debt in this country, and not the gold dollar or any other dollar? We adopted the current Spanish dollar in 1792 because that was the dollar in which debts had been incurred; we stuck to the same dollar in 1834, when the market relation between silver and gold had been changed by the blundering and mischievous legislation of England and the vicissitudes of supply and demand; and we stuck to it even after the opening of California, when the gold dollar became cheaper than the silver one; because the history of the world assured us that gold would fluctuate again, and the gold dollar would rise above the silver one. We never surrendered the option of tendering whichever of the two dollars we chosed. It was while the option existed that we went into the late war and that we got into debt to each other and to foreigners. The promise to pay so many dollars, which is printed on our national notes and our bank-notes and our State, municipal, and corporative bonds, either meant or means so many dollars, either of 371¼ grains of pure silver or 23.22 grains of pure gold, at the option and pleasure of the debtor; or else it has no reference to metal at all and means so many "dollars" in paper promises. The attempt which has been made to convert these promises, which amount in the aggregate to several thousand millions, into promises to pay gold dollars, by means of the mint act of 1873 and the revision act of 1874, I declare to be entirely unprecedented and unconstitutional.

The Senator from Vermont says that "the issue of any large amount of silver-dollar coinage has never been the policy of the United States;" that "from 1793 to 1805, inclusive, the whole amount coined was $1,439,512;" that "from 1805 to 1836 not a dollar was struck at the mint;" that "from 1793 up to and including 1840 the whole amount coined was $1,501,822;" that "since 1840 the whole amount coined has been $6,544,016," and that "the total of the silver dollars struck at all the mints of the United States from 1793 up to this day amounts to no more than $8,045,838," and he adduces a long table from the mint records to support these statements.

The Senator concludes that—

> These facts show the inconsiderable figure that silver dollars have played in our monetary affairs from the foundation of the Government and the groundlessness of the complaint relative to the law of 1873.

With all deference for the opinions of the distinguished Senator, I maintain that they show nothing of the kind. From 1792 up to 1873 the people of this country enjoyed the option of paying their debts in either the silver or the gold dollar at pleasure. Because they may have chosen during the most active portion of this period to pay them in gold dollars in consequence of the fact that gold dollars were cheaper than silver ones is surely no reason why they should without any consideration whatever have been divested of that option by an obscure coinage act of whose purport and tremendous significance they were not advised.

But the Senator did not give us all the facts in this connection. He omitted to state that we were producing no silver in this country during that period and that Spanish silver dollars and fractions of dollars were in circulation in this country to a very large amount and that up to 1853 they were a full legal tender at their tale value for the payment of debts, and to that extent obviated the necessity and expense of coinage at our own mints. He also omitted to state that American half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes, which were coined in large amounts, were also full legal tenders, and at their tale value up to 1853. If he will add to this eight millions of silver dollars all the Spanish and other foreign silver coins in circulation in this country and all the silver fractional currency coined at the mints, all of which were full legal tenders for the payment of debts up to 1853, he will then and only then be able to furnish us with all the facts in the case. When he does this it will be found that, instead of playing an inconsiderable figure in the circulation of this country, legal-tender silver played the most important figure until the time when gold was over-valued by the law of 1834.

"Silver is urged to the front," continues the Senator, "because it is now more abundant and consequently cheaper than gold; so is copper; so is iron," &c. I have already shown, and at some length, the reasons why copper, iron, and all other metals or substances, except silver and gold, are incapable of efficiently performing the functions of money. None of these other substances, except, perhaps, platina, possesses the requisite characteristics for a measure of value. Even platina, which possesses every necessary intrinsic quality, is deficient in a respect which is almost as important as an intrinsic quality; there is no great stock of it on hand in the world; no reservoir from the ages to steady the fluctuations in prices, which, if it were used as money, would be occasioned by the vicissitudes of its current supply from the mines. This point I illustrated heretofore by adducing the history of platina coins in Russia, and it is this point especially that forms the strongest argument in favor of monetizing silver as a legal tender for the payment of debts to any amount. Let me quote from the most recent publication on the subject:

The essay on bimetallic money by M. DeLavelye, which the distinguished Senator from Ohio called attention to the other day, says:

> As is well known, the precious metals have a tolerably stable value, because, the annual supply forming only one-sixtieth of the whole stock of the world, an increase or decrease of the annual product is only slightly felt, and would have to continue constant in order to have much influence. The larger the stock the less will any increment or decrement in the supply of gold or silver affect the value of the whole quantity. If you admit into the circulation both gold and silver, the stock of specie will be about fifty milliards; if you exclude silver it will be only about twenty-seven or twenty-eight milliards. Being thus reduced it would be more easily affected by an increase or decrease of the supply. Suppose that after 1850 gold had been demonetized, as was advised by M. Michel Chevalier, what an enormous fall in value would gold not have sustained; following a sudden increment of half a milliard of annual production. What a rapid rise of prices would have occurred in countries where gold money was employed! As was set forth by the Netherlands monetary commission of 1873, the coinage of gold into money in countries where the double standard is employed served as a parachute to prevent the degradation of that metal and the mischief which would have resulted from it.

And yet the very class of men whose interests were thus saved from annihilation by the double standard, the creditor class, the fundholders, mortgagees, and annuitants, are those who would abolish the double standard and limit silver to the base office of fractional token money. Nothing but the narrowest selfishness or short-sightedness could possibly urge men to commit a blunder which, in case of the discovery of new and extensive gold placers, might greatly endanger the very interests which they would now so unjustly and unwisely enhance. Such a contingency is by no means remote. The entire continent of Africa is being laid open to the explorer, and that vast portion of the earth would have to differ from all the other great divisions of the globe if it should fail to yield what they have each yielded in turn, vast alluvial deposits of gold, washed out of the rocks by the rains of centuries.

I shall conclude my reply to the speech of the Senator from Vermont with noticing the parting shot, the Parthian arrow, which he discharges at some of my previous remarks.

The Senator is sarcastic over the supposed connection between the movement of the currency and incendiary fires, marriages, divorces, homicides, suicides, and other crimes, and asks if I regard silver as the great panacea for these evils. I never referred particularly to silver in this connection. My argument was that while the volume of any currency was diminishing, whether that currency was of silver or gold or paper or anything else, or all combined, prices would fall, the normal relation of debts, commodities, and services would become deranged, and that this would aggravate the various social disorders noticed.

To support this view I will briefly quote from three authors of repute, namely, G. R. Porter, esq., Henry Thomas Buckle, and Dr. William Farr, the registrar-general of England:

> It is curious to observe how intimate a relation exists between the price of food (and price, of course, depends upon currency) and the number of marriages. * * * The relation that subsists between the price of food and the number of marriages is not confined to our own country; and it is not improbable that, had we the means of ascertaining the facts, we should see the like result in every civilized community. We possess the necessary returns from France, and these fully bear out the view that has been given.—Porter's Progress of the Nation, volume 2, pages 244, 245; London, 1838.
> It is now known that marriages bear a fixed and definite relation to the price of corn; and in England the experience of a century has proved that * * * they are simply regulated by the average earnings of the great mass of the people; so that this immense social and religious institution is not only swayed but is completely controlled by the price of food and the rate of wages.—Buckle's History of Civilization, volume 1, page 24. Appleton's edition.
> The marriages of 1850 and 1851 exhibit the excess which since 1750 has been invariably observed when the substantial earnings of the people are above the average.—Dr. Farr in the London Statistical Journal for June, 1852, page 185.

If the Senator demands that a direct connection shall be established between the prices of wheat in all Europe and the annual supplies of gold and silver in all the world, he will find it fully set forth for a period covering one hundred and twenty-six years, in a work on currency by Joseph Heath, London, 1841, page 81.

The speech of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SHERMAN] is very unlike the speech of the Senator from Vermont.

It seeks to defeat the restoration of the double standard, not by direct antagonism, but in disarming its advocates by going a portion of the way with them and promising to go further when they shall have surrendered.

The Senator admits the supernal importance of silver in the money of the world and the necessity of restoring it to our coinage, and therefore the weight and consequence of the amendments which I have had the honor to propose. He admits the legality of the double standard, for he refers to the silver dollar as a "legal tender until 1873, and in strict law" (the Senator would surely have no loose law in the important matter of contracts) "might be restored to its position then as a standard of value without a violation of the legal contracts between the United States and the bondholders;" and "if a contract made before 1873 was stipulated to be paid in coin, it could undoubtedly be paid in silver as well as gold coin, and those contracts payable in coin can be and ought to be payable in the coin made a legal tender when the contract was made or was payable, and ought not to be affected by a subsequent law." He admits the honesty and respectability of the silver dollar proposed in the bill, for he calls it "the old time-honored standard of silver dollars of full weight and fineness." He admits the value of the silver dollar, for he calls it "the real dollar that pays where it goes," and distinguishes it from "a paper dollar, which only promises to pay." He admits that the present extraordinary rise in gold, or as I think he erroneously states it, the silver "depreciation, grows mainly, if not exclusively, from the action of foreign governments in dealing with their coin," and therefore impliedly admits that the restoration of silver to its long-time place in the money of this country would tend to counteract the assumed depreciation by increasing the demand for silver and diminishing the demand for gold.

All these things he admits, for I have quoted his opinions in his own language; yet, most strange to say, in almost the same breath he seems to deny them all. He denies the importance of silver in the money of the world, except for the purpose of a degraded token coinage; "for," says he, "the bimetallic system, with all its uncertainties at a time when it has been rejected or is being rejected by all commercial nations," and "the objections to the bimetallic system is that, from the nature of things, it is impossible to fix the true relation of silver and gold to each other, and when either advances in value a single hair it becomes demonetized and flees the country." And, concludes the Senator on this head, "they" (the advocates of the pending amendments to restore the double standard) "raise the most difficult questions of political economy and the most delicate questions affecting the public credit, and at a time when above all others we ought not to attempt to decide them." He denies the legality of the double standard, "for," says he, "all contracts payable in coin prior to 1873 were impliedly payable in gold coin," and "ever since 1853 silver coin has been practically a legal tender only for $5;" and "why disturb this law?"

Again he says: "This policy," the single gold standard, or, as he styles it, "the composite standard, was adopted by Great Britain in 1815 and by the United States in 1853;" and "it is far wiser for us to stand by the composite standard in force in the United States since 1853;" and "such is the basis of the report of the Committee on Finance." Again, while he is in favor of recoining the old silver dollar, he would limit its use by denying it legal-tender functions for sums over $20 and by restricting its free coinage. Evidently he desires to make these coins pass current for more than their bullion value, and thus make all the retail every-day business of the country rest on a false basis. Such conditions as these should have no place in any sound monetary system.

The criticisms I shall make on the propositions advanced by the honorable Senator will be very brief. The bill as it stands proposes to limit the silver dollar in the payment of debts to sums of not more than $20 in any one payment. The amendment proposes to restore the silver dollar to its constitutional, proper, long-time place in the monetary system of the country: that of an unlimited legal tender.

This is not raising a difficult or delicate question; it is not, as the Senator elsewhere calls it, an "inopportune consideration," or "a radical change in the existing law," or the "expression of extreme opinions." On the contrary, when stripped of the sophistries by which its opponents endeavor to obscure it, it is a perfectly simple question. There is no better time to decide it than the present. It proposes no radical change in the law, but simply restores the law as it existed from 1792 to 1873, when it was changed without consultation with the people, who were so deeply interested in its provisions.

The Senator avers that the bill without the amendments "prepares the way for resumption in gold by laying a foundation of silver coin," and in another place assures us that it will give us all the silver that will circulate at par with gold. To these somewhat confident assurances I respectfully demur. I deny that the prosperity of the country would be enhanced by a speedy resumption in gold. I believe that there are insuperable difficulties in the way of such resumption. I do not believe that token silver will bring us any nearer resumption than token paper. Gold resumption, as at present advocated, means that the payment of all currency debts, public and private, shall be in dollars, each containing 25.8 grains of standard gold. No amount of silver coinage bound down by legal-tender limits to petty transactions would materially assist the people to resume on these rigorous terms; but restore the old silver dollar, unhampered and unrestricted, as it was from 1792 to 1873, and you will furnish the people with a real dollar, worth almost exactly the same as the paper dollar, and one which would equitably settle obligations and contracts without injustice to debtor or creditor. By its increased use it would slowly but surely appreciate to its old-time relation with gold; and thus in safety, and without shock or disturbance, you would reach that very resumption in gold which you desire, and reach it over a solid highway of silver.

Anything short of an unlimited legal tender and free and unrestricted coinage for silver will prove a delusion and a snare.

The Senator holds that "the serious effects of such a proposition upon our national character and credit cannot be measured in dollars and cents," and in this I agree with him; only I go further, I do not believe that it can be measured in anything whatever, simply because it can have no effect, certainly no disastrous effect, upon that character or credit.

Rather would it degrade that character and affect that credit injuriously were we to permit our creditors, and at their pleasure, to violate the contracts they made with us; to refuse to accept silver dollars when by the terms of the contract they had agreed at our option to receive silver or gold. They would inevitably come to suppose that, by ringing the changes on "honor" and "dishonor," they could do anything they pleased with us and alter our monetary system and the terms of contracts at will.

What is it they ask for? Do they appeal to the equities of the case? Then let us open up the original transactions and see what they gave us for our bonds. I think it will be found that for each dollar of them they paid us about sixty cents in the then cheaper metal or its equivalent; and equity would pay them but sixty cents in the now cheaper metal or its equivalent in return. Do they appeal to the law of the case? The law makes the bonds payable in coin at the rate of 25.8 grains of standard gold or 412.5 grains of standard silver, at the option of the Government. The option was theirs then when they loaned; the option is ours now when we pay.

When an agent of the Government offers to sell its bonds upon the market, what questions are asked by those to whom they are offered?

"Is the agent authorized?

"Are the bonds genuine?

"When and where are they payable, and with what options or conditions of time and place?

"In what money or option of moneys are the principal and interest payable?

"What is the rate of interest, and at what intervals of time, at what places, and with what option of moneys or other conditions, is the interest payable?"

Where are the answers to these questions found? Are they sought for in common rumor or the word of the agent? Nothing of the sort. The lenders find them in the law, and this determines the price they are willing to offer for the bonds. If there is any ambiguity about the law, the ambiguity is measured and deducted from the price offered for the bond. If the law is clear and reserves certain options or conditions to the borrower, those options or conditions are measured and their estimated value deducted from the price. No man voluntarily shuts his eyes when he is lending money, and of all men who look closely to their own interest you may depend upon the public creditor

Well, then, what does the law say? I need scarcely repeat it. It says that a dollar is so much gold or so much silver, at the option of the payor; and the payee must accept it or nothing.

As I have before stated, I do not care to enter into a discussion as to the legality or policy of paying either the interest or principal, or both, of the public debt in silver. It is not important to the argument. If it shall be deemed wise policy under existing circumstances to strengthen our credit by giving a bonus to our creditors, well and good. I deem it an entirely unimportant matter alongside of the question of the justice and policy of paying our other debts, State, municipal, corporative, and individual, in silver. Nobody claims that these other debts are payable in gold. They amount to a sum far transcending that of the national debt.

According to a speech delivered at Oshkosh, Wisconsin, October 1, 1874, by Mr. JAMES G. BLAINE, the sum of the debts of our cities amounted at that date to five hundred and seventy millions, of our counties to one hundred and eighty millions, and of our States to three hundred and ninety millions, making a total of eleven hundred and forty millions. To this sum may be added ten thousand millions of individual and corporative debts, making altogether eleven thousand one hundred and forty millions, which, if this bill is passed without the amendment, will have to be paid in gold; while if it is passed with the amendments may be paid in silver. If these debts are attempted to be paid in gold, this metal, which is now 15 per cent. above silver under the old relation, may, and probably would, rise to 20 or 25 per cent. If paid in silver, gold would probably fall to par in silver at the old-time relation of 16 for 1. This is the overwhelming consideration that must give us pause. These State, municipal, corporative, and individual debts, amounting to five times as much as the national debt, by comparison sink the latter into insignificance.

But I cannot pass over the Senator's objection, which, should the silver dollar be deemed a good legal tender for the national debt, would have some application to the amendment proposed. He says that with our present mint facilities we could not have enough of silver dollars coined in three years to pay the interest on the national debt, and therefore warns us against coining any of them. I do not see the force of this logic. If we cannot coin enough silver dollars for the purpose intimated, that is no good reason why we should not coin all we can, nor why we should not pay all we can in that metal, if it be right to pay out any of it for this purpose, and the remainder in gold. He seems to apprehend a scarcity of silver, while the Senator from Vermont fears that there would be a redundancy, or, as he terms it, "a flood of it." They may both be wrong, but they certainly cannot both be right, and I leave them to off-set each other.

I trust that it will be clearly understood that the advocates of bimetallic money do not purpose to make either of the precious metals a legal tender for any more than their value in the markets of the world. We propose no debased money; no tokens; no money to pay the creditor which is not as valuable as the money he advanced; no untrue or arbitrary relation between the metals; no scheme of advantage to the owners of gold or silver mines, nor to anybody except the people at large. Our proposition is to coin both gold and silver bullion at cost for all comers and make the coins a legal tender for all amounts. The relation we propose is the old one of 16 for 1. The experience of centuries teaches us to believe that this is approximately the relative cost of production. If this is true, let nations tamper with their coins as they may, it will inevitably become the market relation. If the large additional use be given to silver which the amendments to this bill contemplates, that market relation which has long continued would be speedily re-established. If, on the other hand, the relation is fixed at 16½ or 17, or any figure over 16, all hopes of our being able to utilize our product, or Europe's rejected stock of silver, will be defeated. We should either be driven to the exclusive employment of gold or else new legislation and a new ratio, involving the expense and delay of a recoinage, would have to be established.

Our argument is for free money. We regard all restrictions upon money as pernicious, and that there is as much and no more right on the part of the Government to limit the use of money at its free market value as there is to limit the use of bread, meat, or other commodities whose exchangeable value it is designed to measure.

We hold that the employment of silver and gold in the arts is essential to the retention of their worth as money, and that this employment acts as a parachute to retard and lessen the fluctuations incited by the vicissitudes of their production in the mines; we hold that nothing can be good money which can be used for money alone; we are opposed to token coins or coins to which the law gives a value which the market denies, believing that their use is fraught with peril of insecurity, injustice, panic, and counterfeiting; and we believe that no form of credit can by itself properly serve the purposes of money, and that its use should always be voluntary and never forced.

By money is meant gold and silver coins, with the option of employing either one or the other at a ratio based upon the experience of long periods of time. This option was enjoyed by the people of this country from 1792 to 1873. It was secured to them by the terms of the Constitution, and though attempted to be taken from them by the mint act of 1873 and the Revised Statutes of 1874, the option is theirs yet, and they cannot be deprived of it by legislation.

Have Senators well considered the importance of an option in a money contract? The United States Government issues bonds payable at its own option at any time after five years or before twenty years. This is its option. The Government may call in and pay off these bonds after five years, or it may not choose to do so until twenty years. The case is similar with other bonds issued by this Government, the ten-forties, the twenty-forties, &c. This option it paid for by accepting a lower price for the bonds than they would have commanded had the option been omitted. Thus far the Government has not availed itself of its option in any of these last-named bonds and it may never do so. But is this any reason why it may not lawfully and honorably do so if it chooses? And is there any reason, because it did not choose to exercise its option of paying silver dollars up to 1873, why it may not lawfully and honorably do so now?

The whole object of an option as to time, or metal, or any other particular of a contract, between debtor and creditor, is to prevent one party from crowding or cornering the other, or to take advantage of favorable turns in the market.

Unless we reserved a time option in our bonds, they might be presented for payment at an inconvenient moment, when we could not meet them or when the rate of interest for money was unusually high. Unless we reserved an option of metals in which our debts could be discharged, we might be called upon to pay them in a temporarily scarce or cornered metal, such as gold is to-day.

Is the creditor "cheated" when the debtor makes avail of an option which forms an explicit and distinctive feature of his contract? Does the debtor "dishonor" himself by choosing whether he shall pay in five years or twenty, in gold or in silver, at one place or another, provided his contract gives him these options? I should say not. Justice, common sense, plain English say not; but certain Senators here say "Yes." They prophesy an immediate downfall of our credit, "the return of our bonds in ship-loads," says one of them, should we choose to exercise our option, which we paid for, and of the right to which nothing short of an amendment to the Constitution can deprive us.

Says an influential metropolitan journal of recent date:

> Prior to 1873 all debts contracted to be paid in coin were legally and equitably payable in gold or silver.
> It is just as immoral to change the obligation of contracts in the interest of the creditor as to change the obligation of contracts in the interest of the debtor.
> The unexpected fall in the price of silver or rise in gold in no way affects obligations legally and equitably payable, according to the terms of the contract, either in gold or in silver coin.
> The question whether the single or the double standard should be adopted with respect to future transactions should depend solely upon the general public interest, and in no degree upon the private interest of individuals as owners of gold mines or of silver mines, as debtors or creditors.

These propositions are followed by an extended article, in which they are worked out with ability.

The writer, however, falls into one very extraordinary error, and, as it is upon an essential point of the whole subject, I cannot do better than to notice it in this place.

He says that the position of the advocates of the double standard has been weakened by resorting to the argument that to demonetize silver all over the world would practically double all its debts. He contests this upon the ground that "the various forms of credit used as currency affect prices quite as much as coin itself, and that an insignificant proportion of modern transactions in civilized countries are settled by payments of money." This insignificant proportion he assumes, for the sake of argument, to be 1 of money to 20 of "credits used as currency." Hence, he concludes that, if the demonetization of silver should result in no "increased use of credits, it would lessen by not more than one-fortieth the amount of currency used at the chief commercial centers in determining prices."

Without assenting to either of the propositions that the use of a given sum in credits used as currency, say bank-checks, or even bank-notes, affects prices quite as much as a similar sum in money, or that the proportion in use of one to the other is as 20 is to 1, both of which propositions I deny, it is enough if it be agreed on both sides that a vast superstructure of credits rests upon a comparatively small base of real money, and that both money and credits assist to support prices. I say that to take away one-half of the base, as you would do if you demonetized silver, would be tantamount to destroying one-half of the superstructure, and, consequently, to the doubling of all debts, while the critic holds that you may remove one-half of the base without disturbing the superstructure, and consequently without affecting prices or the relation of prices to debts.

As it is essential to this argument to determine which is right, I propose to test both arguments by altering the proportions assumed in the examples. According to my doctrine if you remove one-half or any other proportion of the base, you destroy the same proportion of the superstructure, and my correctness is demonstrated very conclusively by the table of prices of wheat referred to in a previous part of this speech. According to the critic, you may remove one-half of the base without affecting the superstructure. If you can remove one-half without perturbation you can remove five-eighths, three-fourths, seven-eighths, or even the whole of it, and prices would remain the same. If the critic is right we need no specie basis at all.

And this is precisely the attitude of those Senators who favor the demonetization of silver or its degradation to the position of a token. A token coinage is a credit coinage, the extent of the credit, which is enforced by law, being exactly that of the difference between the legal and the market value of the metals contained in the coins. They would diminish the metallic base one-half and at the same time increase the superstructure by the emission of a credit currency.

Another leading metropolitan newspaper doubts that gold is scarce or growing scarcer, because it observes that unprecedentedly large sums of it are heaped up in the banks of England, &c., and offered in vain at low rates of interest. This critic reminds one of the pigmies who were lost in the giant's ear: The mysterious labyrinth confused them, and being unable to take a comprehensive view of the whole subject they failed to discover that the ear was only a small appurtenance to a vast body, whose proportions were perfectly symmetrical and harmonious. It is neither the abundance nor the scarcity of money at one period compared with another that causes the rate of interest to fall or rise, but reasons far different from this one. Among these reasons is the appreciation or depreciation of the standard. The reason why gold cannot find employment in England is not because it is too plentiful, but because it is daily becoming more valuable by reason of its increasing scarcity. Nobody there wants to borrow an ounce of gold which now costs ten days' labor while the certainty impends that he will have to pay it back with fifteen days' labor. The fact that the rate of interest is cheap is of small account to the borrower when he knows that the principal is growing dearer. Therefore he does not borrow at all, and capital defeats its own object when it seeks to grasp too much. As it is with England in respect of gold, so it is with the United States in respect of greenbacks.

The effort which you are making to unduly "appreciate" the purchasing power of these monetary units has brought all enterprises in this country to a stand-still, and capitalists seek in vain for opportunities to loan their funds even at low rates of interest. The advocates of a single standard have never seemed able to emancipate themselves from the erroneous views which were announced by the original monometallist, Sir William Petty. This gifted but erratic genius maintained that a double standard was impracticable because the market relation between the metals was liable to continual variance. The same error was maintained by John Locke and Lord Liverpool, and we find it echoed in speeches that have recently been made in this Chamber. Its origin seems to be due to the term "double standard," which conveys the notion of using both metals at the same time, whereas a double standard means nothing of the sort. It is freely admitted that however constant the relations between the metals has been and probably will continue to be throughout long periods of time, it is liable to change at any moment. It is also admitted that a very small change of this relation is sufficient to cause the melting or exportation of one metal and the importation and coinage of the other, for the two operations always occur together. It is therefore admitted to be impracticable to retain for any long time both of the metals in use to the extent of one-half each.

A double standard means not a dual standard, but an optional one. Its great advantage consists not in the maintenance of an idle, acrobatic poise between gold and silver, but in making avail of the entire stock of the two precious metals in the world as a basis of credits and of prices.

This pyramid of metallic reserve, more ancient even than that of Cheops, constitutes the basis of all prices, of all securities, of all credits, of the social relation, of property itself. You cannot get rid of it if you would. It has survived laws, theories, schemes, and plots without number, and it will continue to survive as many more. The intrinsic and peculiar fitness of gold and silver respectively for money furnish the grounds of this assurance. They both have the same qualities, except that one is lighter and the other is heavier, and even in this difference there is no advantage either way, for both can be handled at the same cost. You may issue a fiat of demonetization against silver, (half of this great pyramid of metal,) but you cannot destroy it. There it stands, and there it will continue to stand. Wisdom, justice, and interest counsel us to recognize this fact and to be thankful for it, and to make a proper use of it. That proper use is found in the bimetallic system or optional standard.

Having ascertained the average or pivotal point of the relation of value between the metals, which is 15½ to 1, the bimetallic standard makes use of both of them for money, employing only one at a time, and of course the one which is temporarily cheaper at the average ratio. This cheapness is not as to other commodities, for then the change would be, in the words of the Senator from Vermont, "notably always downward." It is only between the two metals themselves, so that between them and other commodities the change may be, and was for fifteen hundred years of this era, notably always upward.

And this system is forced upon us not only by its intrinsic superiority to any other; we are constrained to accept it because up to a very recent period it had been employed throughout the world for at least fifty centuries, and all the relations between man and property were based upon it and everything that it involved; and even now, although a few nations have thoughtlessly discarded it, it is still retained by nearly all the world, and those who have discarded it must adopt it again or lose their rank in the scale of civilization. The bimetallic system thus stands upon the same ground as any other of the great institutions of civilized life—intrinsic superiority and immemorial usuage.

No doubt, if society could be entirely reconstructed, many of these institutions might be improved, at least so think the social reformers; but we must remember that society is of a long and gradual growth and that to cut away any of the roots by which that growth has been attained is to endanger the tree itself.

The bimetallic system has many other advantages than the organic one alluded to. For example, though theoretically only one metal is employed at a time, yet practically it employs to a large extent both metals. Coins become worn by use and the actual relation of value between a gold and silver coin in use is commonly so different from their mint relation that there would have to occur a very considerable change in the market ratio of the metals before it would pay to melt or export the coins of either one of them.

These advantages of the bimetallic standard have already been mentioned at length in my previous speech on this subject, and I do not propose to detain the Senate any longer than is necessary to set forth new matter.

There is one notion which seems to stand very much in the way of a correct appreciation of this subject. Those who would persuade us that a resumption of specie payments means, or should mean, a resumption in gold, maintain, first, that greenbacks have no intrinsic value, and, second, that by appreciating them to par in gold they will become worth as much as gold and will become current as gold, whether we possess gold enough to redeem them with or not. By this method of reasoning they conclude that we shall be able to resume, some say with $100,000,000 of gold, others with $200,000,000, &c. They differ as to the amount, but all agree in the method of reasoning, which to me seems unsound.

The main argument against the use of greenbacks or any other form of credit as money is that they have no intrinsic value. Yet the gold resumptionists do not propose to resume actually in gold. They do not propose actually to substitute gold for these intrinsically valueless pieces of paper; but, by contraction or some other means, to increase the exchangeable value of each of these paper promises of a dollar to that of a gold dollar.

If greenbacks have no intrinsic value when they will fetch in the market 89 in gold, will they have any intrinsic value at 90 or 95 or 100? If they are bad money because they are credit-money, when do they cease to be credit-money and when do they cease to be bad? If you have not increased the intrinsic value of the greenback, why then attempt to raise it to gold unless it be desired to give a bonus of from 13 to 20 per cent. to the creditor classes?

The whole of this method of reasoning is puerile. The fact is that greenbacks have no intrinsic value at 89 because they never had any intrinsic value at any price. Such being the case, it is impossible for them to have intrinsic value at all. By arbitrarily contracting the emission of them or expanding the uses for them you might cause them to become worth par in gold or even more than par. You could put them at any figure you please and yet their intrinsic value would be no greater at the end than at the start. Their only value would rest upon the force of law. Withdraw that support and they would fall into the waste-paper basket. But suppose you forced them at par, would that bring the country any nearer to specie payments? Senators assume that it would. I am equally confident that it would not.

If specie payments meant simply the liquidation of the Government promises to pay on demand, we could return to specie payments to-day. We need only to offer to give 5-20 bonds for greenbacks as we did during the war, and the thing could be done at once. But the fact is that resumption involves something more than merely retiring our four hundred million promises to pay. It involves the payment of the general indebtedness of the country and the means wherewith that indebtedness can be discharged. If you retire the greenbacks by funding them there would be no monetary units to replace them, and, divested of every legal means of payment except a few coins in the coffers of banks and treasuries, the only resource of the people would be repudiation; and thus an impracticable means of bringing about specie payments would result in there being no payments at all.

In retiring the greenback you must, therefore, in order to avoid bankruptcies or distress, replace them with other monetary units, equally easy to obtain, not more easy as the expansionists would wish, because thereby you would defeat the just claims of the creditor, not less easy as the contractionists desire, because you would defeat the rights of the debtor and destroy him.

Nothing will answer for these units so well as silver dollars, because these and greenbacks are at an equality in the market and it is as easy to obtain the one as the other.

If, on the other hand, you attempt to replace the greenback with gold you will fail, because, as I have previously shown, it is difficult if not impossible to obtain sufficient gold for the purpose. If you succeed in thus replacing them, in compelling the debts of individuals and corporations to be paid in gold, you will ruin them all and plunge the country into a chronic condition of social anarchy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance; that is, to strike out the words "not exceeding $20" in the fourteenth line of the first section of the committee's amendment.

Mr. BOGY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGY. I ask for the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, for information. Perhaps I may be willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. That amendment is to strike out in section 1 the words:

> And the said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender at its nominal value for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment, except for customs duties and interest on the public debt, and shall be receivable in payment of all dues to the United States except duties on imports.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

> And the said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender at its nominal value for any and all amounts, except for customs duties and for debts and obligations which by their own terms are payable in gold coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. That means all public debts.

Mr. BOGY. There are contracts payable in gold coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are contracts payable in cattle and all sorts of things.

Mr. BOGY. This excepts contracts for payment in gold coin. I do not know that I have any great objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I understand the Senator to accept it? This does not except the payment of the public debt or interest on the public debt from the general tender proposed by this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot have any acceptances; we must vote on the propositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that is the demand made now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is the proposition to strike out and insert or just to strike out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To strike out the limitation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Nevada would have introduced some proposition by way of amendment that would show that he was in point of fact in favor of a silver dollar that would not be a depreciated silver dollar, and that it would conform in some respect to the idea of the Senator from Missouri, for I found that in the course of his argument, at least half the time, he was in favor of a dollar equal in value with the gold dollar.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The Senator will permit me to ask him what he means when he speaks of a depreciated dollar? Depreciated as to what?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will wait he will hear what I mean.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am in favor of a dollar that speaks for itself. If the Senator will tell me what it is depreciated with regard to, what its relative depreciation means, I shall understand him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am in favor of such legislation as will promote the interests of this country, not only for to-day but for a hundred years hence. I am not in favor of a bill that shall be merely a local bill and for the advantage of a single section of the country, for a single interest, without any reference to anything else, as this bill would be if the amendments proposed to-day by the Senator from Nevada should be adopted.

The Senator from Nevada has chosen to characterize some remarks made by me as illogical. I will not characterize his remarks in that way. His amendment convinces me that his purpose and his amendment are both logical, and that the purpose is for the benefit of the owners of silver bullion. The amendment introduced this morning by the Senator not only goes for silver dollars as a legal tender for everything except customs duties, but a subsequent proposition of his proposes that the owners of the bullion shall have it coined at the cost expense by the Government, thereby throwing it into the hands of the owners of bullion as to the amount that may be issued and giving the owners of bullion the entire profit as to the difference between the real value and the nominal value of the coinage. Mr. President, I am not in favor of any such proposition.

Then, again, the Senator from Nevada devotes the larger portion of his argument to the idea that we ought to pay our national debt in silver. I undertake to say that there has been no party and no person within my knowledge that has presented so broad a proposition for repudiation as that would seem to contemplate.

Mr. LOGAN. Would the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am only going to occupy the floor a very short time and do not like to be interrupted.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada admits that this silver dollar has not been in circulation for forty-two years, and the facts exhibited by him show that whenever the silver dollar was in circulation heretofore, it was worth about as much as the gold dollar; and yet now when it is known to all that silver has gone down so that it is not worth to-day as much as our paper money, the Senator wants the nation to disgrace itself, as I think, by assuming that it has the legal option to pay the public debts in silver.

The price of silver has gone down recently, and I do not know where it will eventually stop. To-day it is worth 50¾*d.* per ounce in London. Last Saturday in New York it was worth 99 cents per ounce, which would make a silver dollar to be issued under this bill worth 85.68 cents. The price of gold has gone down from 13 per cent. premium to 12, which leaves the value of the paper dollar at 89.8 cents. Therefore there would be a profit on the part of the owners of silver bullion in getting it coined and exchanging it for paper; and this is the proposition that is presented here, seriously presented for our adoption.

I know that the Senator from Nevada claims that the price of silver has not gone down, but that the price of gold has gone up. That reminds me of something that occurred with a drunken teamster. When he approached his team he gave his near ox a kick in the rear, and the ox responded by kicking back and laid him out flat. "There," said he, "lay there, goll darn you." [Laughter.] Now the Senator supposes it is the gold that has gone up, not the silver that has gone down, and I think there is about as much confusion in his ideas as there was on the part of the teamster in relation to whether he or the ox had gone down.

Some complaint was made by the Senator from Nevada that I was inaccurate or that I did not fully state the facts in relation to the amount of silver that had been issued by the Government since the foundation of it because I did not include the subsidiary coins. Why, sir, this bill does not relate to subsidiary coins; it relates entirely to the dollar; and therefore I made my statement in regard to the amount of silver dollars that had been issued, which was a little over eight millions from the foundation of the Government. And yet here is a proposition to extend the issue to an unlimited amount. I know that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Ohio, claims that in point of fact this issue will be limited by the amount of the sinking fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not only is it limited in that way, but none can be issued except for a United States note surrendered. If the Senator says the silver dollars are worth 4 per cent. less than United States notes, I ask him if that is not limit enough? Nobody can get one of these silver dollars unless he surrenders a United States note.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then, Mr. President, we are limited in consequence of the fact that nobody will be willing to exchange even paper money for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now just there; if the Senator's argument is correct, there will be none issued and no harm done; but I know they will be issued, and he knows they will be issued, probably not to any large amount. I do not believe a very large amount of those dollars will be issued; but he knows they will be issued. I say to the Senator now, and I think he has the same information, there are demands for $10,000,000 of silver coin awaiting our action, so that they can be paid out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is no purpose on my part at all events to object to the issue of silver, to object to the use of the subsidiary silver coins to any amount that can be used by the country and be kept at par. I estimate the amount for that to be about $5 per family; that is to say, reckoning five persons to a family, about forty millions. I think that is about as much as will be naturally absorbed by this country at any one time, although if a limit could be fixed I might be willing to fix upon a larger sum. But here is a proposition to issue silver dollars, and to make them a legal tender for all dues to the Government except customs dues. That is in effect, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] stated this morning, to reduce the amount of our revenues by just the amount that they are worth less than greenbacks now, or less than greenbacks may be worth hereafter, if they shall ever approach to the par of gold.

Mr. President, there is no purpose on the part of anybody to demonetize silver. The only object of those who oppose this bill is to keep silver in its proper place and in circulation as change for the uses of the people and of the Government; but unless the amount of silver to be issued as a legal tender shall be limited, of course in the end it is to drive out all the gold we have and is to wholly supersede the standard of gold in the end. I do not think that we can afford to place ourselves at this era of the world in opposition to the universal sentiment of the most enlightened portion of mankind, which makes gold the chief basis of a legal tender and uses silver merely as a subsidiary coinage. When it is argued that the gold coinage is for the benefit of the rich and the silver for the poor, let me point to the significant fact that in England, where they have an exclusive gold currency, with the exception of using some sixty or seventy millions of subsidiary coinage of silver, the rate of interest is but about 3 per cent., and in Germany, where it has now been changed to the gold standard exclusively, the rate of interest is about 2 per cent. If that is not an advantage to the poor as to the rate of interest to be paid, I confess that I am not able to understand it.

Mr. BOGY. There is a still lower rate in France, where they have a double standard. It is lower in France than in England or Germany.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BOGY. The fact is so beyond a doubt.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Not for the common people; nor does the government of France negotiate its national loans as cheaply as these other governments. They have not done it for the last ten years. Every one knows that they have paid nearly twice as much for their national loans.

Mr. BOGY. They have paid the same price as the exchequer bills of England were issued for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will address the Chair.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of continuing this discussion at any length. The Senate may not be prepared to take the whole leap which this bill proposes, but I think if they commence and go as far as even the Senator from Ohio is willing to go, they will in the end be compelled to take the next step. Are they prepared to promulgate this policy to the world in the face of the doctrines of the democratic party and of the republican party, for I do not understand that the democratic party are in favor of repealing the resumption act of 1875, except that, as they say, the time fixed in it is too soon and they would be in favor of a more efficient and practical mode of reaching it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will see to-morrow that they are on rather a different basis, I am afraid.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Very likely I may, but I do understand that the action on the part of the republican portion of the Senate and of the House was that we should resume in 1879 on the gold basis and bring the value of the paper dollar up to that of the gold dollar.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator refer to the platform of the republican party?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I refer to the act of Congress.

At the proper time I shall propose to amend the bill so as to give an approximate amount of silver to the value of the gold dollar. At the present moment it would take nearly 480 grains to be worth as much as a gold dollar. The weight of the gold dollar need not be very much augmented to accomplish that result, because our silver dollar is only nine-tenths fine. One-tenth part of it is alloy. Therefore if we should put in less alloy there would be very little need of increasing the weight. I cannot conceive how the Senator from Nevada can object to making the silver dollar approximate to the value of the gold dollar. Never in the history of this country, or of any other where they have talked about a double standard, has there been any attempt to issue the two together with one far below the other. You cannot find that Gallatin, or Hamilton, or any of our own statesmen ever recommended anything of that sort. They did come very near, at the start, in issuing the two metals at precisely the same value. I claim it is the part of statesmanship to do it now, but to issue silver simply because the price of silver has gone down is a species of legislative legerdemain to which I cannot, for one, consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I thought I should not say anything more about this silver bill, for I am as tired of it as I ever was of any bill in my life. So many amendments are proposed, so many matters are discussed on the bill which are not in the bill, that I again invite the attention of the Senate to its provisions. Many propositions have been debated outside of it, but the provisions of the bill as reported are few and unobjectionable. By the law as it stands, passed January 14, 1875, we agreed to redeem all the fractional currency of the United States presented to the Treasury in certain silver coin long recognized by law, pieces of fifty cents, twenty-five cents, ten cents, and the like. We agreed to do that. It was found in the execution of that law that it was very difficult indeed to carry it into effect, because the very fact that only fractional currency was provided to be redeemed in that way made fractional currency scarce. People therefore had to buy fractional currency in order to get silver coin. It was not the interest of the people of the United States to make an artificial scarcity of fractional currency and induce persons to buy the fractional currency in order to get silver coin. Therefore during the present session of Congress several bills to aid and promote the conversion of our fractional currency into silver coin have been proposed and passed. There has been a great demand for silver coin, far more than appears in the Senate Chamber. There is now a demand for more than $10,000,000; so that if the bill we passed the other day through the Senate should become a law, the whole of that $10,000,000 would be exhausted probably in ten days, as rapidly as it could be paid out. There is still a necessity for making further provision for the issue of silver coin.

Under these circumstances, both Houses simultaneously agreeing upon the same proposition, simultaneously had bills introduced to facilitate the redemption of our fractional currency by issuing subsidiary coins for United States notes; that is, instead of compelling the people to buy up the fractional currency, it was proposed to provide that if they brought United States notes to the Treasury the coin should be paid out for those United States notes. One of the bills which we passed provides that in such cases the fractional currency should go into the Treasury by a natural course, and the legal-tender notes should be paid out. That is provided for to the extent of $10,000,000; but we know very well from the continued demand for this silver coin that it will be necessary to issue more silver coin that can be converted either under the law we passed a few days ago or under the resumption act of 1875. Then it was that both Houses came to the general idea that whenever any United States notes were presented to the Treasury we should issue subsidiary coin. The House of Representatives provided to issue the subsidiary coin and cancel the United States notes, and sent to us a bill for that purpose. The Senate at the same time had a bill pending to the same effect. Then the House, after some debate, passed an additional section declaring that a silver dollar should be issued, and that that silver dollar or the old silver dollar should be a legal tender to the amount of $50. Upon my motion, and upon the request of the Committee on Finance, that section was stricken out upon the promise made by us all—concurred in by my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and all Senators—that we would again present the question of the legal tender of the silver dollar in a separate measure. The Committee on Finance unanimously requested me to urge the passage of the first two sections of that bill, so that the process of paying out silver coin might go on, leaving this question of legal tender to be decided thereafter. We therefore reported to the Senate a bill to aid in the payment of silver.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By taking in the greenbacks?

Mr. SHERMAN. By taking in the greenbacks. That bill is pending in the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has not become a law.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is pending upon an amendment as to the trade-dollar.

If Senators will take this bill and look at the sections as I will read, they will see the precise questions which were presented to the Committee on Finance. I will leave out the dollar and read section 2 as it would stand without the "dollar" at all:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the subsidiary coins of the United States for an equal amount of United States notes, which shall be retired and canceled.

That was the operative part of the provision of the law to which both Houses seem to have assented. The object is to facilitate the redemption of fractional notes, and to give the people the silver coin of the old standard, subsidiary coin, in any quantity which they desire, for United States notes, and not put them to the trouble or to the sacrifice of buying fractional currency to bring it in for silver coin. Can any man object to that? It is the law now. It was a part of the resumption policy, and a part of the intention of Congress to promote the paying out of silver coin. We know that before the war $50,000,000 of this same kind of coin was issued and was in daily circulation. We know now that with the increased population of our country as the fractionel currency disappears we shall immediately need at least $80,000,000 of these small coins to be used as the ordinary change of the country. We know that in England they have $65,000,000 of small coin, worse than ours, less in value intrinsically than ours, with a population of 30,000,000 people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By "intrinsically" the Senator means less in value in relation to gold, I understand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; their silver coin is not near so valuable as ours. Sixty-five million dollars in shillings and various forms of silver pieces are in circulation in England, while their value is only eighty-two or eighty-three cents in gold, while ours is worth 86½ according to my friend, putting it very low. The silver coin we issue is better than the coin of any other nation in the world in proportion to gold, and all other nations maintain at par with gold a subsidiary amount of silver coin, and we are only providing, by the measure we propose, a certain amount of silver coin to serve for the ordinary change of the country; and we propose to maintain it at par with gold when we shall have reached the gold standard. In the mean time we propose to maintain it at par with our legal-tender paper money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you mean by "a certain amount?"

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount is not fixed by law, but experience has established it. It is issued generally as long as people desire it. This bill, in that respect, is exactly like the old law for issuing subsidiary coin. If anybody goes to the Treasury of the United States with United States paper money and wants the silver, we give it to him. We receive it back to any extent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But do you call the dollar a subsidiary coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, as we provide for it in the bill, as I will show hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But according to the previous legislation, is the dollar a subsidiary coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will allow me to finish my remarks about the subsidiary coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of the Senator and of the Chair as well. I was only asking for information. I only want to get light.

Mr. SHERMAN. I first want to show the Senate the necessity of passing this bill so far as the subsidiary coin is concerned. The idea which troubles my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that it is necessary to have a limit is ideal. In the first place, the coin is issued only when a citizen of the United States or any person comes up and surrenders a United States note that is now a legal tender for all sums. Then we issue silver coin and retire the United States note.

What is the use of the limit? The very moment the silver coin becomes too abundant, is no longer demanded, no more United States notes will be brought in for it. The thing will check itself. It is like the demand for beef, or corn, or pork, or potatoes. The very moment you supply the demand the notes will not come in to be exchanged for subsidiary coin, and therefore it is not necessary in the first place to fix a limit, and it is impossible in the next place to fix a definite limit. No man can fix it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I now be allowed to ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the present theory the Senator states that there is no necessity for a limit, because when the demand is exhausted there will be no further occasion for a supply. I ask him this question: Suppose we redeem all the United States notes, so that the only money of the United States is gold and silver; then, if the dollar be a subsidiary coin and is to be forced as a legal tender to any extent, do we not fall into the very evil that the Senator says we are not likely to fall into, because nobody will bring in the notes? When we get the notes all in the silver must go out.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I were to try to answer so impossible a proposition as the Senator puts to me, I should never get through to-night. Suppose, he says, we redeem all the United States notes with silver——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not with silver coin, but under the redemption act suppose we redeem the legal tenders, where do you find yourself?

Mr. SHERMAN. The silver will come directly back into the Treasury. We take it for all dues except customs duties. We collect in the way of internal revenue $120,000,000 per annum; we receive the silver coin to any extent for all these dues, and make it a legal tender to the amount of $5 between private individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how does that leave it, if there is a real disparity between the value of silver and gold of 15 per cent. or over? How does that leave it, because it comes into the Treasury and goes out again as a matter of business?

Mr. SHERMAN. How does it happen in England, how does it happen in Germany, how does it happen in France?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking the Senator, not he me. I am trying to get light.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because of the absolute necessity of silver change, if its bullion value was only one-tenth of the value we give to it by our stamp, it would still pass at par with gold. Why, sir, the copper we use is not worth more than about one-third or one-fourth——

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is not a legal tender.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a legal tender to the amount of twenty-five cents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is practically a legal tender. You must take the experience of mankind; and we know that, while gold is the general standard of value, a certain amount of silver is indispensably necessary to carry on the ordinary operations of life; and yet Senators, although the law requires us to issue it, do not seem to be willing to issue this silver money lest perchance somebody will step in and make it a legal tender when they do not want it to be a legal tender, or propose to make it so to an amount greater than they think it ought to be a legal tender.

Now, I ask my friend from Vermont does he intend to pay the fractional currency in silver? Does he intend to pay the United States notes in silver if the people want it? If a man has your dollar bill which is due, and which you say is due in gold, why do you not pay it in silver if he wants it in that? You will pay it to him in gold, you say; you would be glad to do it. My friend from Vermont would pay him in gold if he could; but suppose the man says, "Well, you cannot pay me in gold and do not propose to pay me in gold until two years; will you not give me silver?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator addressing himself to me or to my colleague?

Mr. SHERMAN. To the Senator's colleague, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right. I want to get out of this fight as soon as possible. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have said all that I care to say about the subsidiary coin. This Congress cannot adjourn—both Houses feel the necessity of it, men of all political parties—this Congress cannot adjourn unless it provides some substitute for the fractional currency and some mode of paying out silver change; and the demand for it is continuous. I say myself, so far as I am concerned, I do not want any silver coin; I would rather take the fractional currency; but the demand for silver coin is continuous and in very large sums, and we must meet that demand, and we cannot adjourn without doing it.

So much for the second section. As to the first section, it grew out of the bill passed by the House of Representatives to issue a dollar without defining the nature of that dollar, and make it a legal tender to the amount of $50. The Committee on Finance then undertook to say what dollar it should be, because the House bill did not tell us whether it was to be the trade-dollar or the old dollar. The Committee on Finance therefore reported in favor of the old dollar; that is, the dollar that had been in existence since the foundation of this Government and was a legal tender for all sums until 1873; and with unanimity we concluded that that dollar, containing 412.8 grains of a certain standard of silver, should be the dollar, if any was issued; and it was proposed to be issued by the bill of the House of Representatives. We adopted that dollar as against the trade-dollar, and for this reason: the trade-dollar was more valuable, but the trade-dollar was issued upon the demand of any private owner of bullion. Any private owner of bullion might take bullion to the mint and get trade-dollars for it; and thus the private person who owned the bullion would make the money, the seigniorage as it was called, or the difference between the bullion value and the nominal value. On the other hand, the old dollar was issued by the Government; the amount was limited by the Government; it was never issued unless it was at par with gold or at par with the current standard of the time; and the amount was regulated by the Government; its value was fixed; and any profit that accrued from its coinage inured to the benefit of the people of the United States.

This was the reason why we adopted the old dollar. Then the question was as to how much it should be made a legal tender for. That was again the subject of discussion. We concluded that it was not safe to make it a legal tender for $50, and finally, in the nature of a compromise and confining it to currency contracts, we made it a legal tender for $20. Now I ask the astute Senator from Vermont—the one nearest me, I have discussed with the other Senator long enough—to give me his attention. He put a question to me a while ago. He asked me a while ago whether there would not be great danger in the future in making the silver dollar a legal tender for $20, or for any sum above $5. That is a serious question. That is the only question there is in regard to this bill. The answer to that is, in the first place, that we have excepted from the operation of this legal-tender limit, as it is in amount, all customs duties and the interest on the public debt, so that it cannot be called in question as to gold contracts.

Then by the decisions of the Supreme Court, and by the law as it stands, money thus limited in its legal-tender quality cannot be made a legal tender for gold contracts, or contracts payable in gold or any other commodity. Nearly all the contracts in this country of a domestic character are payable in currency—United States notes. United States notes are a legal tender for all sums upon currency contracts. We thought, therefore, there could be no possible danger in making this silver dollar a legal tender to the extent of $20 on currency contracts, because not only is the amount of these silver dollars to be issued always restrained and within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury and the power of the law, but their value will probably rise rather than fall. At any rate the amount is limited. If they become too abundant, they will go into the Treasury in the natural course of things, in the process of collecting the internal revenue, so that there can be no practical difficulty in making it a legal tender to the amount of $20. To go beyond that we thought might create danger. I myself doubted the propriety of it. I appealed to many Senators here to agree to let the silver dollar stand precisely like the subsidiary coin, a legal tender for the amount of only $5; but I could not, reasoning this matter out, see any practical difficulty or objection in making these silver dollars a legal tender to the extent of $20 in one payment except only on gold contracts and interest on the public debt and customs duties. That is the explanation and that is the reason we reported the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to submit an inquiry to him. He says this silver dollar is to be a legal tender for everything except customs duties and interest on the public debt.

Mr. SHERMAN. To the amount of $20.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, with the limit of $20. He says the Supreme Court has decided that you may, notwithstanding that, make a contract payable in gold which must be paid in gold, and the silver would not be a legal tender for it. Why not in respect of any other contract payable in a particular kind of coin, or currency, or anything else?

Mr. SHERMAN. The decision of the Supreme Court extends to all that. A contract payable in wheat is payable in wheat, and if the wheat is tendered on the day when it is to be delivered, as a matter of course the tender would be held good.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, but that depends. If it is a contract for so many bushels of wheat, then of course a tender of the bushels will answer the contract; but if it be a contract for so many dollars' worth of wheat, then if the wheat be not tendered it calls for dollars. Then the question is, what kind of dollars is it payable in, a silver dollar which is worth only 85, the standard being gold we assume for the purpose of the argument; or is it a duty to pay a real dollar which is worth 100 cents in gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can put a sum to my friend and answer it easier. Suppose a contract of this kind calls for $265. The debtor has a right to pay that in money, of which $240 must be in paper money or what is a legal tender for all purposes—paper money or gold; if a currency contract, of course it would be paper money, and $20 of it might be in silver dollars and $5 in subsidiary silver coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot agree with the Senator's law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is the law. That is the decision of the courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot divide it up. If $20 is the amount of the legal tender in any one sum, it must be a debt that does not exceed $20. If there is a debt exceeding $20, you cannot bring in part silver, and part copper, and part legal-tender paper, and part gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision is:

> The said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender at its nominal value for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment.

I take it that on any payment that is to be made $20 may be tendered in silver.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator say that if the debt were $100 or more, to the extent of $20 you could offer silver and the rest in something else?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I put in a timid, but very firm, protest against any such construction of the statute as that.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I do not have to administer the law, and the Senator will have more to do with that than I shall have, I turn it over to the law; but I think the financial and business sense of it is that which I have stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is material, and it should turn out to be a mistake, we ought to have an amendment to guard against that thing, and say that the $20 might be tendered in respect to any debt to that extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the plain language of the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The plain language, in my opinion, is exactly the reverse, and when it says this silver dollar is a legal tender to the extent of $20 in any one payment, it is a limitation upon the amount of the debt which is to be paid, and if the debt is over $20 you cannot tender the silver at all. That I think is plainly the law. I may be mistaken; but I think that is so, according to the little information I have about the law.

The whole thing comes back to the serious fundamental question that the Senator has stated, what right we have got, we who are administering the politics of this country—I do not mean party politics, but economic politics—to say to the people of the United States and all the rest of the world who deal here that they shall be obliged to take a certain number of grains of silver as representing a certain number of grains of gold when they do not represent that number of grains of gold, if you are to have a single standard? If you are to have two standards, then you do not know where you are any more than you know now when we have gold and greenbacks.

Mr. LOGAN. May I be allowed to ask the Senator from Vermont a pertinent question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. I am merely seeking for light; I do not express an opinion.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator asks what right we have to make silver a legal tender when it does not represent the corresponding amount of gold. I ask what right had you to make paper a legal tender?

Mr. EDMUNDS. As Lord Dundreary says, "that is one of the things no fellow can find out," except as the Supreme Court has said that in a state of extreme public peril and under the war powers of the Government we can do almost anything; but the Supreme Court has not said, and I venture the prophecy, as extraordinary as some of its late decisions have been, that the Supreme Court of the United States never will say that any act of Congress passed in a time of peace making a piece of paper, call it what you will, a legal tender, will stand the constitutional test.

Mr. LOGAN. We will not discuss that now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Silver is a legal tender by the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to enter into this discussion at this late hour, certainly not to any great extent; but I desire to say to my friend from Vermont farthest from me [Mr. MORRILL] that I was a little surprised at his remarks, and I will not say why; but his assault upon the silver of this country is a little extraordinary. I do not understand why it is that such arguments are usually made here in this Senate. If a bill does not exactly suit the disposition or the temper of Senators—some especially—some assault has got to be made upon some person, upon some class, or upon some section. The Senator said that this bill was for the purpose of benefiting a few individuals out West owning silver mines. That is a very extraordinary statement. Suppose I was to say that a tariff on pins or needles, or things produced in the section the gentleman lives in, was a bill for the benefit of a few individuals, he would get wrathy in a moment. That is not the way to argue a question. I ask the Senator who is in love with gold, why it is that making gold the only money in this country is not for the benefit of the gold miners. The reasoning would be just as pertinent as to say that a bill of this kind is for the benefit of silver miners only. It is a strange argument anyhow to me that Senators sometimes make, always against their own country and against the productions of their own country. If silver is used in other countries and is one of the great productions of our country, I ask why it is not beneficial to our country to make it a legal standard as it is made in other countries. If we are the producers of it, the benefit is derived, not by an individual merely, but by our whole country. As we are great silver producers in this country, it seems to me an argument of the character of that made by the Senator is a very strange one.

I said here once that I was in favor of making the silver dollar a legal tender for any amount. So I am; but at the same time I propose to stand and vote with the Finance Committee in reference to this bill. I am in favor of it for several reasons: first, because it is the money of the Constitution, just as much as gold; second, it is money and can be made so as well as gold; third, because it is one of the great productions of our country; and, fourth, because it is a necessity to the people now.

Why is it that silver should not be a legal tender? Because it is worth less than gold? Is that the reason? That is not the reason. If that is the reason paper would not be made a legal tender when it is less valuable than gold. It is made a legal tender for the convenience of the people and of the country when you can bring it up to such a standard as other countries have. But if my constituents had all their wealth in railroad bonds and in Government bonds perhaps there might be some reason then why I should insist that the whole country should be impoverished in order to benefit my particular constituents to the disadvantage of everybody else. But, sir, the argument in opposition to making the silver dollar a legal tender when you give it a certain value is an argument in opposition to ever paying certain debts in this country in anything but gold, whether we have the gold to pay them with or not. That is the reason of it, and that is all there is in it. But by a trick—and I use that word because it is a proper one in this instance—by a trick of legislation in 1873 the people of this country were deprived of the right of paying their debts in silver dollars. The words "gold dollar" were used in an act passed in 1873, arranging for the mintage of subsidiary coin, and the words "silver dollar" were left out, and by that character of legislation the silver dollar was demonetized in this country. From the beginning of the Government up to 1873 any debt, bond, or note was payable in silver dollars. Your bonds, issued by the Government, were payable in silver dollars until 1873.

Mr. BOGY. Until 1874, until the Revised Statutes. The law of 1873 does not prevent paying a debt in silver.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is correct. But the law of 1873 did not include the silver dollar, though it included the gold dollar. Then in revising the statutes the revisers left the silver dollar entirely out of the law; and in that way the people were defrauded, if I may use such a term, of the right to pay their debts in silver dollars. I do not mean that it was an intentional fraud, but what we call sometimes in legislative parlance a moral fraud. That is at least as soft a term as can be applied to it; and yet, with all that legislation before this country for three-quarters of a century, by which up to that time the debts of this country were payable in silver dollars, by this character of legislation the people of this country were deprived of that right; and we are told now, when the object is not to restore it for any amount—it was a legal tender then for any amount—but to restore it restricting it to $20, that it is for the benefit of a few individuals!

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I referred especially to the amendment presented this morning by the Senator from Nevada, which went to the extent of making silver a legal tender for all things except customs duties, and then provided that it should be coined for the owners of silver bullion for their exclusive profit, less only the bare cost of coinage.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I misunderstood the Senator then.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That was all I referred to in that connection.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the Senator's remarks applied to making the dollar a legal-tender dollar for all sums, I take issue with him. Though I stand by the bill of the committee I am in favor of restoring the law that existed up to 1873 or 1874 making it a legal tender without limit, for it ought to be done. At the very time your Government entered into these contracts the silver dollar was a legal tender, and the contract was made with that statute on our books, and the people who entered into the obligation with the Government so understood it, and it is no fraud upon them and no wrong against them or any one else that it shall be restored.

I know it is sometimes the case that the voice of the people of this country is stifled by legislation, stifled by their own representatives. When the voice of this country demanded an act of legislation that was voted by a majority of both Houses their voice was unheeded. Now when the people of this country demand that the silver dollar that we produce in our country shall be restored as it stood up to 1873 or 1874, they are not to be allowed that either. Why? Not because they do not think it is right; not because they do not demand it; not because it is not right; but because, if I may make such a remark, a minority, a few men in "this country demand nothing but gold, so that they may enrich themselves upon the distress and poverty of the people of this country. No sane man, in my judgment, will state to-day to this country that gold is produced in sufficient quantities to pay the debts of the Government and to redeem the obligations of the Government. I do not believe any man will make such a statement as that. When an impossibility stares us in the face we are still told that that must be carried out; this must be done, no matter what the cost may be to the country, and nothing but that shall be done. Now, sir, in my judgment, that is unprofitable legislation, and profitable legislation is to pass this bill or a similar one.

But, says the Senator from Vermont, if you take this step you have got to take the next step. If this is a good step, God speed the time that we shall take the second; I do not care how soon it comes as far as I am concerned, and I partially represent nearly as many people as the Senator from Vermont does, with nearly as much aggregate wealth; a people with as many interests, and certainly a class of people that bear the heavy burdens of this country, for the people that I represent pay more taxes to this Government than almost any other State in this Union.

We are told that this is a western interest; but I say it is an interest for the whole country; an interest that the country has a right to demand shall be considered; and, as I said, I repeat to the Senator from Vermont that I hope the time will come when the silver dollar will be made a legal tender for all amounts. It ought to be; it always was until 1873, and it ought to be so now. I state it now as a fact known that the silver in the Treasury, all the coin that can be coined, is demanded and asked for by the people in this country and has been for months; and we had to pass a law, as the Senator from Ohio said, which was a part of this bill as it was first reported, in order that the Secretary of the Treasury should be compelled to issue that money. He failed to comply with the law, as I believe; refused to put out the silver in accordance, as I thought, with what the law was that required him to do it, and we had to pass a bill at this session in order that he should be compelled to do it. As was said by the Senator from Ohio, the demands are more to-day than the supply, so far as this coin is concerned. As the people demand it and use it; as it is money that they recognize; as it pays debts; as it has already been a legal tender and was contemplated as such by the Constitution, I ask why it is that we should not give them this right; why it is that it will not be a benefit to the country to do so? We need the supply diffused among the people and need it now.

I will not take up the time of the Senate any further. I should have liked to discuss this proposition in a different manner and more at length; but I will not do so. It has been discussed sufficiently, at least for this time of day.

PAYMENTS OUT OF CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Appropriations a resolution which was referred to us this morning relating to the funeral expenses of a page and some other expenses. We recommend the passage of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, the medical and funeral expenses of Frederick Peck, deceased, late page in the Senate, and the medical and other expenses incurred by L. B. Cutler, an employé of the Senate, on account of the injuries received by the recent explosion of gas in the Capitol: Provided, That all bills rendered shall be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate before they are paid.

Mr. SARGENT. The objection I made this morning was not to the propriety of the resolution, for I agreed in it, but I had a doubt whether this money could be paid out of the contingent fund under such a resolution. I find, however, the precedents are that way, and therefore the resolution is reported.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATE MANUAL.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the following resolution, report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk be directed to prepare a new edition of the Manual, and that 1,000 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

I will state that the edition which was ordered has been exhausted and every new Senate convening requires additional copies. There will be none of the present edition next March for the new Senate. It is in accordance with precedent.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 950) declaring certain roads in the State of Missouri post-roads; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have a committee of conference appointed before that is done. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. PATTERSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to put that beyond a contingency. I believe the Army appropriation bill has been returned from the House of Representatives with a request for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 28, 1876.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. ATKINS, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. HURLBUT be the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and consent to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the managers on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. ALLISON, LOGAN, and THURMAN were appointed the conference committee.

LEGAL TENDER OF SILVER COIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have withdrawn the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 3398) for the issue of coin, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to the amendments of the Committee on Finance; which is in line 14 of the first section of the amendment of the committee, to strike out the words "not exceeding $20."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it would not be better to adjourn? The Senate is very thin; there is scarcely a quorum present, and there ought to be a fuller Senate when we vote on such an important question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is a quorum here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me the Senate is too thin to take a vote on such a question; but I will not interfere.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] He would vote "yea" if present, and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES, (after having voted in the negative.) I am reminded of a pair I made some time ago on this bill with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON,] and I desire to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Ferry, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Key, McCreery, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, Whyte, Windom, and Withers—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Booth, Christiancy, Cragin, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, and Sherman—14

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Wright—41.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As there is not a quorum I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 28, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MCCRARY. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] to allow me to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls for the regular order, which is the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the bill relative to the distribution of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] is entitled to the floor.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. The Committee on Appropriations having had under consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report back the same and to move that the House non-concur in the amendments and ask for a committee of conference, upon which motion I call the previous question.

I desire to state to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he was utterly mistaken in his apprehension that a motion was not made by me yesterday to reconsider the reference to the Committee on Appropriations and to lay that motion on the table. That was done.

Mr. CONGER. I was informed that such was the fact, although it was not announced to the House. I ask that the amendments be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to call for the reading of the amendments. If he insists on that call, the Clerk will read them.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman has the right to have them read before they are voted on, but not before the previous question has been ordered. That must be first put, after which of course there can be no discussion; but the amendments may then be read in the order in which they are to be voted upon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendments of the Senate to an appropriation bill should first be considered in Committee of the Whole. Let me state my point. It has been strenuously urged that the Senate has no right whatever, and should not exercise the power, to amend an appropriation bill. Now it is a fundamental principle governing this House that everything in the shape of a tax on the people should be first considered in Committee of the Whole. The Senate under the Constitution have the right to make amendments; and they have increased the appropriations in the bill as we sent it to them. This is an additional tax upon the people. If, as has been insisted by the ex-Speaker pro tempore, the Senate has the same right to originate money bills that it has to originate revenue bills, I raise the point that, this increase having been made in the Senate, this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole, as has always been done in previous Congresses, for the consideration of these amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I do not recollect that it has ever been done in previous Congresses.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It was always done in the last Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Not in the case of amendments. The bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole; but after that it becomes a question between the two Houses upon differences.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will see that he is not taking the sense of the House at all whether we will adopt these amendments in whole or in part.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee recommend that we non-concur in all the amendments, and on that motion the previous question is asked.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What committee?

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But it ought to be submitted to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The House can vote down the previous question if it thinks proper.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. O, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania resorts to the previous question, of course he has a majority there, and can gag this side.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to gag or do anything that is unfair to the other side; and the gentleman must not say that. I am for expedition now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would be glad to see some expedition now.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that the desire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that the bill and Senate amendments be sent to a committee of conference as speedily as possible in order that the points of difference may be sifted there and the scrutiny of the House brought upon them when that committee reports.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that this proposition is rather in the interest of speed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Maine must see that when the committee of conference reports we must adopt its report as a whole or not at all. Now, if these amendments of the Senate were considered by the House in Committee of the Whole we might adopt some of them.

Mr. RANDALL. When the report of the committee of conference is made gentlemen have the privilege of discussing it, and if they do not like it they can vote it down.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We cannot amend it.

Mr. RANDALL. But it can be voted down and a new committee of conference can be appointed who will conform to the wishes of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The only way in which a conference committee can be instructed is by the House considering now in Committee of the Whole the various amendments and voting upon them separately, as in the last Congress. The committee of conference should have some indication in regard to the points about which the House is strenuous.

Mr. RANDALL. When we are endeavoring to expedite the passage of the appropriation bills, it seems strange that a proposition for indefinite delay should come from that side of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How long will it take to consider the amendments separately?

Mr. RANDALL. A great while.

Mr. ATKINS. It will take a day or two.

Mr. HALE. I would submit as a practical suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that the same majority that put through the bill as it passed the House would on separate votes vote against the Senate amendments increasing the appropriations; so that we would only be traveling the same road that the House has already passed over. It would only take up additional time, with a result the same as the House has already reached. I do not understand that the amendments of the Senate are of much significance except in the increase of appropriations; and it may be assumed that the majority of the House would adhere to its action in passing the bill originally. Therefore I apprehend there is not much to be gained by the delay of reading the amendments and passing upon them separately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me say just one word more. A majority carries these things through; but I hate publicly to acknowledge that in the Congress of the United States a party controls the appropriation bills and that a minority large as this is has no influence in perfecting those bills. I hate to acknowledge that publicly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will follow the line of precedents adopted this session, and will put the question on the demand of the gentleman from Tennessee for the previous question. Is it seconded?

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were non concurred in, and the House agreed to ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as the managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. HURLBUT of Illinois.

NEW ORLEANS INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged question. I report back from the Committee on Printing, with the recommendation that it be adopted, the resolution referred to that committee for printing the testimony before the investigating committee at New Orleans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report made by the gentleman from Mississippi is privileged. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the conduct of Federal officers at New Orleans be, and they are hereby, authorized to print the testimony taken by said committee touching all matters under investigation before said committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SILVER COIN.

Mr. PAYNE. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, with Senate amendments, and to recommend concurrence in the amendments; and upon that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill in line 4 by striking out the word "now" after the word "coin;" so that it will read: "the silver coin in the Treasury."

Add the following section:

SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was on concurring in the Senate amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for separate votes on the amendments.

Mr. FORT. I ask that the joint resolution be read in full, as proposed to be amended by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $16,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund, separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be re-issued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States; and said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered on this joint resolution.

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair will recognize me for the purpose, I will move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we ought to have an hour's discussion on this joint resolution, if members desire to be heard upon it. Notwithstanding the previous question has been ordered, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] reporting it is entitled to an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There can be no debate on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered. The previous question itself is undebatable, and a motion to reconsider a vote upon an undebatable question is not debatable. After that question shall have been disposed of, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] will be entitled to an hour for debate upon the original joint resolution, if he claims it.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. My object is merely to offer an amendment.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I raise the point of order that the first question must be upon the motion to reconsider the action of the House sustaining the call for the previous question, and that there can be no debate pending that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent the motion to reconsider may be considered pending while the debate goes on.

Mr. KASSON. If the Speaker entertains at this stage a motion to reconsider the previous question, then I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to move to lay that motion on the table?

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table and that motion is carried, will he allow any discussion during the hour to which he is entitled, having reported this joint resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. I had not proposed to discuss the matter.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. This joint resolution ought to be explained by the gentleman who has charge of it; the House is entitled to some explanation upon so important a question as this.

Mr. PAYNE. I will explain the joint resolution and amendments if gentlemen desire it.

Mr. RANDALL. Other gentlemen may desire to be heard.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I cannot yield now. I am under obligations to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] not to take up more time than is absolutely necessary in the consideration of this subject.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman call for a separate vote on the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. PAYNE. I propose to withdraw my call for a separate vote.

Mr. CONGER. Then I renew it.

Mr. PAYNE. When this joint resolution was originally drawn up there was a propriety in inserting the word "now," for at that time there was more than $10,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin in the Treasury, and it was supposed that the issue of $10,000,000 would be fully met by the surplus coin then in the Treasury. When the joint resolution reached the Senate the amount in the Treasury had been reduced below $10,000,000; hence the propriety of striking out the word "now." That is all there is in the first amendment. The second amendment has relation to the trade-dollar. I suppose it is generally understood by the House that the trade-dollar is local in its importance. It is made a legal tender all through the country to the amount of $5. The trade-dollar, although containing more silver than two half dollars of the subsidiary silver coinage, is worth less in the market than two half dollars. The complaint comes from the Pacific coast, and they ask that the legal-tender property of the trade-dollar shall be taken from that coin.

I ask the Clerk to read a communication from the Director-General of the Mint to the chairman of the Committee of Finance of the Senate, which led to the adoption of this additional section by the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1876.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
United States Senate.

I recommend that the last section of the twenty-million silver House bill, which provides for the repeal of the legal tender of trade of dollars and places the issue of that coin under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made an amendment to the ten-million silver-coin House bill, to be considered in the Senate to-day. It is important that the status of the trade-dollar should be altered as proposed before July 1, otherwise we shall be embarrassed in getting out the necessary amount of subsidiary coin.

H. R. LINDERMAN,
Director of the Mint.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish merely to add that this additional section, in the precise words employed here, has already passed this House as the third section of what is known as the Randall bill, the first two sections of that bill providing for an increase of the subsidiary silver coinage to the amount of $20,000,000. This section, word for word, is the third section of that bill, and has already been adopted by the House. I think there can be no further explanation needed, and therefore I ask a vote on the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like a little time on this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. If I was not trespassing already upon the courtesy of the gentleman who gave way to me, I would be glad to yield.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman obtained the floor by courtesy, I hope he will exercise courtesy toward others.

Mr. PAYNE. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RANDALL. Not many minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman, without giving up my right to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I regret that the Committee on Banking and Currency have not seen fit to incorporate into this bill the three sections of the bill originally introduced by me and passed by the House. They have taken the third section; and that is well enough in its way. In fact this bill, so far as it goes, is in my judgment all right; but the committee ought to have taken action as to the whole subject of subsidiary silver coin, so that we shall be enabled when we leave here at the close of this session to feel an assurance that those who administer the mint laws will be able under our legislation to provide the people with sufficient subsidiary coin to answer the purposes of business, without increasing the permanent debt by the purchase of more silver.

If this bill is passed and no other measure on the subject be adopted, the Government will have to supply the subsidiary coin by the purchase of silver under the original resumption act, which authorized the increase of the public debt for that purpose; or else we must have legislation such as is embraced in the first two sections of the bill to which I have alluded, so that the Government may with money in the Treasury purchase bullion and issue it as resulting coin to the people.

Now, there ought to be in this country as much as $50,000,000 of subsidiary coin to take the place of the fractional currency. Unless the gentleman from Ohio and his committee—the Committee on Banking and Currency—will adopt some measure to insure an adequate supply, we shall encounter great difficulty. This bill provides temporary relief, so that silver may be gotten into circulation, and as I said before, so far as it goes it is well. But the Committee on Banking and Currency, before we leave here, must do something whereby the public from this time forward will have furnished to them gradually a sufficient amount of silver coin for all business purposes in substitution of the fractional currency, which is now being rapidly worn out.

Mr. WIKE. I would remind the gentleman that this House has already passed such a bill, and it is now under consideration in the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I know it; but the Senate halts there, and I will tell you why, for we may as well look this thing right in the face. This bill is a measure somewhat in the interest of contraction; at least that is the comfort drawn from it by the "hard-money" men. The other—the bill which I introduced—was regarded as looking in the other direction. Now, for one I desire that the question of resumption of specie payments shall not be connected at all with the question of substitution of silver subsidiary coin for fractional currency; and, with due respect, I think the Senate ought to allow us to settle the question of such substitution without reference to any effort on their part to force greenbacks out of circulation. If the Committee on Banking and Currency had incorporated in this bill the two sections to which I have referred, we should have kept the subjects distinct. We should have supplied an adequate amount of subsidiary coin for all the purposes of trade, for retail business of every description; and we should have reserved the resumption question as a distinct matter. That question ought not to be mixed at all with this legislation; it is not the same character of question.

I hope, therefore, that the gentleman's committee will adopt some measure to meet the exigencies of the case, so that we shall not go away from here until this question of supplying the adequate amount of subsidiary coin shall have been settled. This section has to me the appearance of yielding on the part of the House—and yielding entirely and exclusively to the caprice or the judgment perhaps of the Senate—upon that question of an increase of subsidiary coin. The Senate, so far as I can draw conclusions from the speeches of members of that body, is not disposed to give any additional subsidiary coin unless it takes out of circulation an equal amount of greenbacks. That is the conclusion to which the remarks of Senators, in my judgment, clearly point. I desire, therefore, that we shall speedily have reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency some measure which will not leave the country, after we have gone away from here, without any fractional currency or subsidiary coin.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment upon this question; and I am very glad that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has relieved us from the necessity of occupying much time, as he really does not oppose this bill. The acting chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. PAYNE] has stated in a few words the whole purport of the bill. There is but a single word left out that the House has not already acted upon, and the omission of that word is in the very direction that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires.

For myself and other members of the committee, I can only say that this prompt action on its part is designed for the express purpose of assisting in reaching the result which the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires and which I desire; that is, to provide the requisite amount of "change" for the people who so much need it. Letters come to us from all the Northwest imploring us to hasten this matter of supplying the people with "change." We have stopped issuing fractional currency, and there is not "change" enough. I differ from some others, I suppose, on my side of the House in the opinion that the country can easily absorb $50,000,000 of subsidiary coinage and a deficit still remain, owing to the disposition to save more carefully this solid money than to do the same with paper which merely represents it.

But, sir, all this will connect itself with other bills. I rise to say that the committee has recommended concurrence in these Senate amendments because the principal one has already passed the House and the second helps us to a prompter disbursement of this subsidiary coin which we have in the Treasury. That is the only effect of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: Unless some such measure as I have suggested be adopted, how will you reach $50,000,000 of subsidiary coin without adding to the public debt as provided for in the resumption act?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania unfortunately forgets it is useless for us to discuss what is not before the House. This is before the House, and this bill was passed for the purpose of accomplishing an immediate relief. Another bill has been passed by the House to furnish additional relief, which is under consideration by the Senate. If necessary we will pass a third bill to relieve the wants of the country, but this bill now reported by the acting chairman of the committee is the first by which we can reach that result. The gentleman from Missouri wishes to ask a question.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask what condition is this bill in? Was the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was withdrawn. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not a motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered in order?

Mr. KASSON. Not while the gentlemen from Ohio is on the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. We must have that motion some time.

Mr. PAYNE. We will take it in time.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Missouri wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. BUCKNER. The Committee on Banking and Currency has accepted one amendment to what is known as the Randall currency bill. That is the third section. I ask why they do not insist, inasmuch as the House passed two other sections, they also shall be added.

Mr. KASSON. There are two reasons, both of which are good: one is that it delays the relief which is most pressing, and to which the Senate does agree; the other is that it is useless (and I think gentlemen must admit it) for us to force a twenty-million bill, to which the Senate may not agree, upon this bill, to which they do agree; and consequently we run the risk of getting nothing unless we get this.

Mr. BUCKNER. I think the House ought to insist on its own bill.

Mr. KASSON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, not wishing to detain the House longer.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not propose to yield further.

Mr. RANDALL. Whenever you get through I will enter a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot enter a motion to reconsider while the gentleman from Ohio is holding the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to say in further reply to the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my demand for a separate vote.

Mr. KASSON. The question is on concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask for a separate vote.

Mr. RANDALL. Whenever the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor, I have the right to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BANKS. The motion to reconsider a vote is a privileged question within certain limits of time, and that is when the subject to which it relates is not before the House; but when the matter is before the House it must be deferred till the proper time.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not yield for that purpose. I wish to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency were unanimously in favor of the bill, which proposes an increase of $20,000,000 of subsidiary coin, and, I have no reason to doubt, every member of that committee adheres to that opinion as expressed when that bill was first before the House. No doubt that matter will be attended to if our bill is returned from the Senate. I now ask for the vote on the Senate amendments.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio now yields the floor when he demands the vote. Does the Chair decide that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered is not in order, and that he can debar a member by non-recognition from making such a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes that the motion to reconsider is of high privilege, but while the gentleman from Ohio is on the floor on a subject-matter before the House, and refuses to yield to the motion to reconsider, it cannot be recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. He cannot be on the floor after he has demanded a vote on the amendments, and, having left the floor, my motion is in order, as it is a privileged motion. When the gentleman from Ohio takes his seat the House of course proceeds to the vote under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has not taken his seat.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand, under the rule, a member can move to reconsider even while the gentleman from Ohio is upon the floor, but the vote on the motion to reconsider cannot be taken until he has taken his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The difficulty here is that there must be immediate action on the motion to reconsider, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not the floor for the purpose of obtaining that action. The first question is on concurring in the Senate amendment, which will be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand to be heard on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled that the gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman can take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. How can the gentleman from Ohio be on the floor if the Chair is proposing to put the question on the Senate amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot move to reconsider the vote by which the main question is ordered now, when in the proceedings of the House can he move it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio yields the floor when he calls for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the first amendment of the Senate.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 69, noes 68.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, tellers are ordered; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. PAYNE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 78.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the yeas and nays on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask now that my motion shall be entertained. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The main question is still operating. The gentleman can enter a motion to reconsider after the adoption of each particular amendment, and at the close may make a motion to reconsider all.

Mr. KASSON. I have called for the yeas and nays on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. Now I ask that the question be stated, that it may be distinctly understood by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which the House is now dividing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill in line 4 by striking out the word "now" after the word "coin;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin in the Treasury, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. My object is to get a vote upon the insertion of the two other sections of the House bill. If we could have entered the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, then we could have tested the sense of the House upon inserting those two sections. Now, I do not want to retard this bill, but I desire to have the opportunity of testing the sense of the House on the insertion of those other two sections.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. KASSON. In answer to the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I want to say that the Committee on Banking and Currency have reported both bills recommended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and now he endeavors to defeat the unanimous wish of that committee by defeating his own bill.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I do no such thing.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 98, not voting 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Banks, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. So the amendment was not concurred in.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. JENKS. I desire to state that my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. SHEAKLEY, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BOONE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. BROWN, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. SPARKS. My colleague from Illinois, Mr. HARTZELL, is detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. YEATES. My colleague from North Carolina, General VANCE, is detained in his room by sickness.

Mr. HAYMOND. My colleague from Indiana, Mr. FULLER, is unavoidably absent on account of sickness.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES. If he were present I would vote "no." I am not sure how he would vote. I therefore decline to vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. EAMES. I move to reconsider the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can move to reconsider the last vote, but the question on that motion will have to be put at once. It will not carry him back to the vote ordering the main question. The previous question while operating must go through, and while it is operating the order of the House cannot be interfered with by any other motion except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer an amendment to insert the other two sections.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no authority to admit such an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether if the next amendment is voted down I could then be recognized to enter a motion to reconsider each vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can then be recognized to make a motion to reconsider each one of the steps taken by the House under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. The operation of the previous question being then exhausted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; the previous question is then exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. My object is to get in the other two sections to which I have alluded.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman need any motion whatever to reconsider provided these amendments are voted down? Will not his amendment then be in order?

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I am asking the Chair.

Mr. BANKS. The rule is certainly clear and just that where the previous question is ordered on a matter it must be executed. When every vote has been taken that the previous question requires, then in order to get back to the original question the motion to reconsider each vote must be made and carried.

Mr. RANDALL. The previous question is called upon the motion to concur in the two amendments of the Senate. If they are not concurred in, is it not then competent for the House to insert my amendment?

Mr. BANKS. The bill would then go back to the Senate with a non-concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. Can I not then move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to insert the two sections I have indicated?

Mr. BANKS. The motion to recommit cannot be made while the previous question is pending and not fully executed.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will make the motion after this amendment has been disposed of.

The question recurred upon the second amendment of the Senate, to add the following:

SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit, from time to time, the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand of the same.

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 37, noes 74; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAYNE and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 40, noes 83.

Mr. EAMES. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. FORT. Is it in order now to postpone the further consideration of this matter for the present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, and that point of order having been made, nothing is now in order except a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. EAMES. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. FORT. By unanimous consent the House can postpone this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. It will go back to the Senate with a non-concurrence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it in order for me now to move to recommit the bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would not now be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Where is the bill? Is it on the table?

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate may recede from their amendments. It is not usual to anticipate a committee of conference in this way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no further count is asked on the amendment of the Senate, the House will refuse to concur with the Senate in that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair mean to say that I cannot move to recommit the bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is what the Chair means to say. The point of order has been raised that no quorum voted on the last vote. But two motions are now in order, one for a call of the House and the other that the House adjourn.

Mr. EAMES. I have already moved that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can test the question whether there is a quorum present or not by calling the yeas and nays on concurring in the last amendment of the Senate to this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the presence of a quorum is concerned the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn would determine it just as well.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn having been voted down, the only other motion now in order is a motion for a call of the House, unless the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] withdraws his point of order that no quorum voted upon the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the last amendment of the Senate was rejected.

Mr. FORT. There was no vote announced rejecting that amendment, and the action of the House upon the amendment cannot now be reconsidered, because that question is not yet determined; no quorum voted and the House is still dividing on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That point is made too late, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no demand for a further count, the amendment of the Senate can be considered as non-concurred in.

Mr. WHITE. I move a call of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it competent for me to move, at this stage of the proceedings, for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not now in order at this stage of the proceedings. And the Senate may recede from its amendments; if the House fail to concur in the Senate amendments the joint resolution will go back to the Senate.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. A committee of conference was asked a short time ago upon the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill, which the House had just non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question now before the House and in order is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WHITE, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ODELL. I renew the motion that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to upon a division, ayes 36, noes not counted.

Mr. BANKS. In order to find out whether there is a quorum present, I call for the yeas and nays upon concurring in the second amendment of the Senate, which was pending at the time the House found itself without a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 108, not voting 122; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Banks, Bradley, Candler, Cutler, Davy, Denison, Dunnell, Durand, Eames, Frye, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Haymond, Hendee, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Joyce, Kasson, Kimball, Leavenworth, Lynch, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, Miller, Norton, Oliver, Payne, Pierce, Piper, Platt, Potter, Rainey, John Robbins, Sampson, Seelye, Smalls, A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bagby, John H. Bagley, Ballou, Banning, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Bradford, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cox, Crapo, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Eden, Egbert, Ely, Foster, Freeman, Frost, Fuller, Garfield, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Hale, Haralson, Henry R. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Woodburn—122.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES. If he were present I would vote "no."

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. TUCKER, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. WIKE. My colleague, Mr. BAGBY, is absent on committee service. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. SPARKS. My colleague, Mr. HARTZELL, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If here he would vote "no."

Mr. HUNTER. My colleage, Mr. CASON, is absent from the House on account of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to concur in the last amendment. My purpose is to move that the House concur, with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has now reached a stage where the motion to reconsider is in order. If it be adopted, the question will then be divested of the operation of the previous question, and will be open to debate and amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the pending motion debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the floor, and move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon concurring in the second amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment of the Senate the following:

SEC. 2. That, in addition to the amount of subsidiary coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints, and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to the amount of $20,000,000.

SEC. 3. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased, from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue as herein provided without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury, as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] that he may offer an amendment upon which he desires to test the sense of the House. After that amendment is offered I shall ask the previous question.

Mr. LANDERS of Indiana. I move to amend the proposed amendment by adding the following:

And it is further provided that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar of the same weight and fineness in use January 1, 1861; and said dollar shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Mr. RANDALL. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was first upon the amendment of Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana.

Mr. KASSON, and Mr. LANDERS of Indiana, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 55, not voting 123; as follows:

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 7.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

So Mr. RANDALL's amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES; that he did not know how he would vote, but if he were here, he himself would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of the Senate as amended, and it was concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope that will not be agreed to. I wish to bring to the attention of the Chair what took place yesterday in reference to the bill (H. R. No. 2798) to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken, there were ayes 16, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire now to bring to the attention of the House, and especially to the attention of the Speaker, the action of the House yesterday on House bill No. 2798. A motion was made by a gentleman on my left [Mr. SAVAGE] to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Upon that motion no quorum voted. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] who had charge of the bill was understood to withdraw the objection on the ground that no quorum had voted. On his withdrawal of the objection I renewed it, but the Chair did not hear me. Afterward, when I raised the question with the Chair, the Chair stated that it came too late; and the Chair stated that he had not heard the objection which I made. I desire to call the attention of the Chair both to the Journal and to the RECORD, which show that I made the objection in time. I hope, therefore, as the Chair failed to hear me in consequence of the noise and confusion prevailing in the House, it will be the pleasure of the House unanimously to reconsider the vote by which the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so as to place the bill back where it was yesterday. I call the attention of the Chair to the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. The bill is now in Committee of the Whole, subject to due consideration of it, and to the introduction of proper amendments, so as to get a well-guarded, proper bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] desire to call up his motion to reconsider at this time?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir; I think no debate is necessary if the Speaker will state the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Virginia that the bill had numerous amendments appended to it yesterday, and has not yet been returned from the Printing Office, and is not yet at the Clerk's desk. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman defer his application till to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have no objection, if the Chair will then recognize me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia to-morrow when the bill is before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If that is understood, the arrangement is satisfactory.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A bill (H. R. No. 3495) for the relief of mail contractors on route No. 19319, in Tennessee.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JENKS. Mr. Speaker, I regret to consume the time of the House at this late day of the session. But in examining the several reports from the Judiciary Committee in regard to the distribution of the fund arising from the Geneva award I was unable fully to concur in any of those reports. It seemed to me that none of them fully did justice in its distribution. Therefore feeling it to be my duty to introduce an amendment to the bill reported by the committee, I have thought it proper and right to state some of the grounds on which I base my opinion. I propose as a part of my remarks at this time to read an amendment which I expect in the future to offer as an amendment to the majority report, as follows:

First. To amend the bill as proposed by the majority of the committee by striking out of the second section all after the words "the third class" and insert instead thereof the following: "The residue of the fund, if any, shall remain in the United States Treasury to be appropriated as Congress shall hereafter determine."

Second. By striking out of section 3, after the words "insurance company," the following words: "Recovering in the third class."

Third. By striking out of section 5, after the words "second classes," "And judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid."

Also, by striking out of the same section all after the words "residue of such unappropriated sum."

The effect of this amendment will be to leave the distribution in this way: That those who actually lost vessels by the confederate cruisers shall be paid first; second, those who paid war premiums shall be paid; and the balance shall remain in the United States Treasury for future disposition.

The reason why this balance should remain is, in the first place, that there is a class of claims highly meritorious which have not been considered at all. Certain persons in defense of the property of their principals, for instance, lost their limbs; others lost their health in consequence of imprisonment and for causes similar to that. Many other meritorious cases exist where remuneration should be made for losses which occurred directly from the act of the confederate cruisers. And this balance it seems to me just should remain in the Treasury to be disposed of by Congress to re-imburse these direct personal losses or any other direct losses of similar character which may appear hereafter to have occurred.

Then another reason why I think the majority report should be amended in this respect is that, if these insurance companies are entitled to anything more than what shall really re-imburse them for what they shall have lost in excess of what they have received, it must be because they have a legal right; because as the law now stands they are re-imbursed for all that they have lost in excess of that which they have received in war premiums. Now, if they are entitled to anything more it must be because they have a legal right. And if they have legal right to any they must have legal right to all. So that the majority report seems to me to be a logical solecism contradictory in itself; apparently acknowledging the title of the insurance companies and yet repudiating it. This amendment, therefore, is necessary to give logical consistency to the majority report and to do justice to those who have actually lost.

During the discussion of this question some of those who think the insurance companies are entitled to the whole fund have seen proper and thought it necessary to introduce authority to establish the principle that a nation should be just. I apprehend this was entirely unnecessary. To be just is a nation's duty and her highest glory. But we must not forget that before the throne of justice truth is the sole ministering spirit; and we can approach that throne only through this medium. We must stand upon truth, and appropriate truth, or justice cannot be done.

There has also been a series of arguments introduced which to me seem to be entirely irrelevant and improper. Something like this proposition has been stated: The United States have recovered this fund from Great Britain. Now, if she, in disposing of it, does not give it to A or to B, she ought to return it to Great Britain. This is a thorough non sequitur. If a man obtains money honestly, how he disposes of that money can in no event affect the justice or injustice of the mode by which he obtained it. So that whether we give this money to the insurance companies or not, if we obtained it in honest good faith from Great Britain and perpetrated no fraud upon her, it makes no difference to whom we distribute it. This, therefore, that we see in the papers, that we wrong Great Britain if we give this to others than the insurance companies, does not follow at all. The fact is, as regards Great Britain, this money was obtained for certain vessels destroyed in consequence of her neglect of duty as a neutral power in the civil war transpiring between sections of the United States. The individual title of no individual was considered in any way.

But I would say here that if in any event it should turn out, or if evidence should be adduced that we have in any manner wronged Great Britain, I would say pay her her money back. It is our duty to be perfectly just. Justice is a more comprehensive term than either national honor or national glory. The honor may be a mere bubble. The glory may be tainted with crime. But justice is one of the immaculate attributes of the Eternal, and is higher and broader than either of the other terms. I would be just to Great Britain. I would be just to every person who presents a claim here; but I would not accept the principle that when we have obtained this money justly, if we do not give it to A, B, or C we should give it back to Great Britain. That question in no way arises here, but is introduced into the discussion in consequence only of that confusion which often arises from attempting to consider two things at once which are in no way relevant to each other.

In approaching the throne of justice it is also necessary to make this distinction, that all truth is not equally important. If I should state as a legal truth that "if a person of sound memory and discretion taketh the life of a reasonable being, and in the peace of the Commonwealth, with malice aforethought, express or implied, he is a murderer." That is a truth, an unquestionable legal truth, which we accept; but it would be entirely irrelevant here. Or if I should state as a fact the accurate dimensions of this Hall, that would be a truth but an irrelevant truth. So that we must not only approach the august throne of justice through the medium of truth, but we must see that that truth is relevant, relevant in fact and relevant in law. Many considerations have been introduced here that seem to me to be entirely unimportant in the discussion of this case.

The first proposition I will endeavor to establish will be that this award was obtained upon the paramount title of the nation, and not upon any individual title whatever; that no individual right was considered by the arbitrators, nor was any individual right the basis upon which this recovery was had. And in reference to this, in order to guard against confusion, it may be well to call to the attention of the House the fact that there are at the same time to all the aggregate wealth of a nation the paramount title of the nation and the municipal title of the individual. They are not necessarily connected at all. The destruction of the one does not necessarily destroy the other at all. The transfer of one does not necessarily transfer the other at all. They are distinct and for distinct and different purposes. The title which pertains to the nation, which is a sovereign as to foreign nations and to the individual, are as distinct as if the two titles existed in distinct individuals, each for its own appropriate purpose.

We may illustrate this by the fact that a nation may sell its paramount title to another in such case. Those who hold a municipal title are not thereby divested of their individual rights or titles, because the municipal title was not destroyed by the sale. But there may be a money consideration paid for the title of a nation. And it may be transferred as fully as an individual can transfer his own.

We have illustrations of this in the history of our own country, in the cases of the purchase of Louisiana, the purchase of New Mexico, and the purchase of Alaska. Those inhabitants who, prior to those purchases, owned property within the purchased territory did not have their title affected at all, but the paramount title of France in one instance, of Mexico in another, and of Russia in the third was transferred to our country. Therefore we want to remember that the municipal title of the individual and the paramount title of the sovereign are not the same at all.

Then, if they are not the same, on what title was this recovery had as to Great Britain? And before we progress further in the consideration of that point it may not be irrelevant to suggest what is title. "It is the means by which the owner cometh to the just possession of his property." Wherever there is no means there is no title. Sometimes the paramount title of the sovereign may be the means of recovering the inferior or municipal title of the citizen. Where I speak of the paramount title of the sovereign and the municipal title of the citizen I do not wish to be understood as derogating from either, because they do not collide; there is no contravention of right between them; they are very often co-existing, but they may be separate.

Another illustration of this point: In a time of war, if a citizen sell his property to the enemy that clearly divests the title of the citizen to that property; but the paramount title of the sovereign is not divested thereby, and the sovereign may recover it back. The citizen has destroyed his title; but the nation's title stands intact as before, and it is as much her property after the sale as before. Therefore we must bear in mind that the two titles are not necessarily co-existent, although they usually do exist together.

Then, there being two titles, on what title was this recovery had? I maintain that it was had solely and exclusively on the paramount title of the United States, which, as to all foreign nations, is sovereign, fully endowed in all respects. The first fact to which I wish to call attention is the very statement of this case. This case stood "United States vs. Great Britain." The award was in favor of the United States and against Great Britain. Now, prima facie, the title recovered upon must have been the title of the United States. Therefore the award itself would be at first prima facie evidence that the title on which that recovery was had was in the United States.

Then, unless sufficient evidence is adduced to the contrary, the award itself would settle it in the mind of any lawyer that it was on the paramount title of the United States alone that it was recovered. This is capable of being rebutted by evidence; because, as I have said before, the title of the sovereign and the title of the citizen are not antagonistic or adverse at all. But prima facie I say that the very award itself is evidence that it was recovered on the title of the United States.

The second fact to which I shall call the attention of the House in reference to the title is that this award was had on three certain rules established by the Geneva tribunal. Those rules were with reference to the duty of a neutral nation in time of war. Now, there is no duty that one nation owes to the citizen of another as such. If war exists between two nations, and another nation recognizes the belligerent state of those two nations, it owes neutral duties to those nations. But the international duty of neutrality exists only between nations, and not between a nation and any citizen of another, independent of his sovereign.

Now, the very ground of the recovery of this award was that Great Britain had violated her duty as a neutral. Whatever was introduced before that tribunal for the purpose of establishing the amount to be recovered was merely evidence of the amount of damages, and was not any ground of recovery. Just as in the case of an action of covenant being brought on a contract between two parties, the contract being one to build a house. You might introduce evidence of what another man's house cost to test the amount of damages resulting from the failure to carry out the contract to build. That would give no title to the house the cost of which had been given in evidence, as it was only a means of finding out the amount of damages done on the breach of contract; or, as we would say in this case, on the breach of national relations between the United States and Great Britain. The ground of recovery before the Geneva tribunal was a breach of duty, which conduced to the destruction of property over which the United States had a paramount title.

If there had not been a single vessel destroyed, the United States could have sustained its ground of action, but the amount of damages would not have been probably so great as that which was awarded. The three rules on which this award was founded show that the ground of recovery was the breach of national duty, which no nation ever owes to the individual citizen of another nation as a citizen.

The third fact is that the court was international. This court could not pass upon individual titles. No nation would appear before an international tribunal to contest with a citizen concerning any right that he might have. The character of the court itself indicates that this was a contest on the paramount title of the United States, and not upon any individual title. And these insurance companies, or any person else appearing there and attempting to establish their title before this tribunal, would have been ruled out without a hearing, as in fact they were ruled out. Every individual title that was there offered as a title was ruled out.

But the arbitrators say, "We settle this question between nations and on national rights, not between individuals at all."

The next fact that we would give in evidence is the instructions of Lord Russell in reply to Mr. Adams, which I quote from a speech of the honorable Senator from Ohio; I have no doubt the quotation is correct:

> Her Majesty's government cannot therefore admit that they are under any obligation whatever to make compensation to the United States citizens on account of proceedings of that vessel, (the Alabama.)

The British government repudiated any obligation to make compensation to citizens of the United States for any injury done to them. "It must be something else than citizen's title that must be considered here," was what the arbitrators said. If the question had been one of citizen's title there would never have been any recovery, as I shall demonstrate as I proceed further in my argument.

It is said by some that the individual title was ruled out on account of that transcendental maxim (a relic of the Dark Ages) that a sovereign could not condescend to contest with an individual. That was not the ground; the ground was that the individual had no title which could be presented there.

My next proposition will be that there was no municipal title to any portion of this property that was destroyed after the moment of capture. However, as to this at present, Her Majesty's government repudiated making compensation to any citizen in that award; that is the ground upon which England acted.

Then with reference to the United States, we find this fact also appearing, that not only the court itself before which this trial was had, and the British government, repudiated all individual title, but the United States did the very same thing; for in the communication of instructions of Secretary Fish to those having this trial in charge the following passage occurs:

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims upon some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the case of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold herself free to decide as to the rights of the claimants' insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recorded in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recorded will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution.

Now, if it had been on the title of any individual that this recovery was had, there must necessarily have been a committal of the Government, because the Government cannot violate private right—cannot take the property of one and give it to another. This principle of law is so well known that if the Government had not stood upon the ground that she was recovering upon her paramount title that which was destroyed by the breach of neutral duties on the part of Great Britain, that communication of Secretary Fish would never have been made by the United States as it was.

These facts sufficiently establish that the amount was recovered upon the paramount title of the United States, and not upon any individual title of any citizen thereof.

But it does not follow because it was recovered upon the title of the United States, that therefore the Government may not have recovered for the use of some of her citizens. If any of her citizens had title to the property destroyed, after its destruction her recovery on her paramount title would necessarily make her a trustee for those whose property was destroyed.

Now, the next inquiry (and to this I will turn my attention more particularly) is, was there any individual title to this property at all at the time the award was recovered against Great Britain? If there was, then the individual who had that municipal title is entitled to his share of this fund, and so are his privies, the insurance companies, if there was title. But if there was not title, then he has no claim above all the rest of his fellow-citizens in like circumstances; nor have his privies, the insurance companies. So that the inquiry now becomes pertinent, was there any title in existence at the time of this recovery except the paramount title of the nation itself? I propose to undertake to demonstrate that there was no other title.

The first fact to which I would call attention in reference to this point is that there was a civil war existing. This appears to me to be a great ruling fact in the case. It seems to a great extent to have been passed over or neglected in the discussions in the House. Yet to me this is the very turning point in this whole discussion. There was a civil war; is that a fact or is it not? If you go over to Arlington and see the thousands of graves marked "unknown" and observe the tens of thousands lying buried there, you will not question for a moment that there was a civil war. Was that civil war organized in all the forms of a regularly organized war? That cannot be disputed. Then the first fact which I shall take as fixed is that there was a civil war existing between the Confederate States and the United States.

But how did England regard this question? England had recognized the belligerent rights of the confederacy. She had said that there was a civil war existing. Then the fact is there was a civil war. England said there was. The United States also gave her assent to the same proposition. In the case of Coolidge vs. Guthrie, 17 Law Register, page 24, the following statement of the case is made by Judge Swayne:

> When the transaction occurred, the rebellion had risen to the proportions of a civil war and was fully flagrant. Arkansas was enemy's territory and all the property there was enemy property. Cotton was an article of foreign and domestic commerce. It was one of the main sinews of the power of the insurgents. They relied upon it for the purchase of arms and other munitions of war, and chiefly to supply them with financial means for the prosecution of the strife. Important belligerent rights were conceded to them by the Government of the nation. Their soldiers, when captured, were treated as prisoners of war. They were exchanged and not held for treason. Their vessels when captured were dealt with by our prize courts. Their ports were blockaded and the blockades proclaimed to neutral powers, and property found on board such vessels belonging to persons residing in the rebel States was uniformly held to be confiscable as enemy property. All these things were done as if the war had been a public one with a foreign power.

Then in the courts of the United States it seems the nation is found as accepting the fact that there was a civil war in existence between the Confederate States and the United States.

The same view is corroborated in the case of the Sarah Starr, (Blatchford's Prize Cases, pages 73 and 74:)

> The hostilities commenced upon the United States by the seceded or Confederate States of the South have produced a state of war between the two communities, as consequent to which the United States are authorized to employ against their enemies the means of resistance and attack which are justifiable under the law of nations by land or naval forces.

Before I go further in reference to this case, I will state this: The claimant of this property was a northern man, whose property was in the South, and it was confiscated under the laws of war because it was within the territory of the then enemy.

> Both of these vessels and their cargoes, so far as claimed, were enemy property within the principles of public law. The sale of the Sarah Starr was negotiated and made by George C. Munro, when he was a merchant trading in an enemy fort, to Gravely, also domiciled and carrying on trade in such place. That sale was unlawful as to Munro, even if, as he contends, he was then a resident of a loyal State, because it was in fraud of his obligations and duties toward his own government.

So the United States courts accepted the fact that a state of war existed.

In the case of Phillips vs. Hatch, which I will not cite now, the same fact is stated equally fully and broadly.

Then, as a fact, war existed, and as a legal fact the laws of war were applied and accepted by the Government of the United States. Belligerent rights had been acknowledged by Great Britain. Then as to all parties who could in any way have an interest there was a state of war fully accepted as existing at the time of this transaction. There being civil war then the same law applied that applies between foreign nations. Under the law of nations the same rules or international principles which ruled as to foreign nations ruled as to this.

And here I may say that we must bear in mind that war has its laws just as well as its arms. We may not justify the one or the other, but it has been found by human experience that the evils of war are much more mitigated by accepting the laws of war than to go upon the principles which existed prior to the recognition of international law. So, whether we justify the conclusions or condemn them, whatever those conclusions are, if they are the conclusions of law it is our duty to accept them as being the lesser of two evils.

The next proposition I purpose to establish by authority is that in a civil war, unless there be express congressional legislation to the contrary, the same rules of international law apply as though it had been a foreign war.

The first authority I cite on this proposition is Vattel's Law of Nations, section 427:

> But when a nation becomes divided into two parties absolutely independent, and no longer acknowledging a common superior, the State is dissolved, and the war between the two parties stands on the same ground, in every respect, as a public war between two different nations. Whether a republic be split into two factions, each maintaining that it alone constitutes the body of a State—or a kingdom be divided between two competitors for the crown—the nation is severed into two parties, who will mutually term each other rebels. Thus there exists in the state two separate bodies, who pretend to absolute independence, and between whom there is no judge. (§ 293.) They decide their quarrel by arms, as two different nations would do. The obligation to observe the common laws of war toward each other is therefore absolute, indispensably binding on both parties, and the same which the law of nature imposes on all nations in transactions between state and state.

The next authority I will cite in pursuance of that is the Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheaton, 283. It is confirmatory of the fact that the United States enforced the laws of war and acted on the law of nations when Spain and her rebellious colonies were contesting concerning the independence of the latter.

> During the existence of the civil war between Spain and her colonies, and previous to the acknowledgment of the independence of the latter by the United States, the colonies were deemed by us belligerent nations, and entitled, so far as concerns us, to all the sovereign rights of war against their enemy.

So that if a civil war is existing as a fact, unless there be some congressional legislation to change the law in reference to it, the law of nations applies to and rules the case.

We will also cite the case of Phillips vs. Hatch, 1 Dillon's Circuit Court Reports, 576, on this same principle:

Were the rules and doctrines of international law at all to apply to this conflict, or were the questions arising out of it to be wholly determined by the municipal law? This general question first came before the Supreme Court in the Prize cases, 2 Black, 635, 1862. It has since been frequently before that tribunal. (See The Venice, 2 Wallace, 258; Mrs. Alexander's Cotton, ibid., 404; The Hampton, 5 Wallace, 372; William Bagley, ibid., 377; The Ouachita Cotton, 6 ibid., 521; Hanger vs. Abbott, ibid., 532; Cappell vs. Hall, 7 ibid., 542; McKee vs. United States, 8 ibid., 163; the Grapeshot, 9 ibid., 129.)

These cases all apply or declare to be applicable to the rebellion the general doctrines of public law which govern in wars between independent states.

So that authorities in international law and our highest court have said that the laws of war were to be applied to this rebellion, as though it had been a contest between two independent nations. This being the fact, then what is the law of war with reference to property captured? What becomes of the title when the property is captured? is the next question. Let me say, without citing authorities, that it is indisputable that whenever a vessel is captured from that moment the municipal title is divested, if the vessel is not within twenty-four hours taken from the captor. If not taken within twenty-four hours there is no municipal title unless by the doctrine of postliminy, which is a war right and never obtains after peace has been made or an amnesty proclaimed, in existence whatever. Whenever those vessels were captured, there being civil war and the law of nations applying to that war, the title of the individual was forever divested unless the vessels were recaptured within twenty-four hours; and this was not done with reference to any of this property for which recovery was had before the Geneva tribunal. We will cite the authorities to establish this before we proceed further.

The first authority I will cite on that point is one perhaps not altogether unfamiliar. I quote from Blackstone's Commentaries, book second, page 400. Speaking of the title by occupancy, and the property as to which title by occupancy may be obtained, the commentator says:

It hath also been adjudged that, if an enemy take the goods of an Englishman, which are afterward retaken by another subject of this kingdom, the former owner shall lose his property therein, and it shall be indefeasibly vested in the second taker.

That is, if these vessels have been taken by the confederate cruisers and retaken by another citizen of the United States, the title would be indefeasibly vested in the second taker, and the prior owner's title would be forever gone:

Unless they were retaken the same day and the owner before sunset puts in his claim of property. Which is agreeable to the law of nations as understood in the time of Grotius, even with regard to captures made at sea, which were held to be the property of the captors after a possession of twenty-four hours.

The next authority I will cite in support of that proposition is Halleck on International Law, page 866:

With respect to things taken by the enemy, the Roman law considered them as withdrawn from the category of legal relations during the period of the enemy's possession of them. If retaken by their former owner, they became his by the recapture; but, if retaken by the State, they were considered as booty or prizes of war, the original right of property being extinguished by the intervening hostile possession.

Then again on page 870:

But the difficulty of recognizing things of this nature—

Speaking of personal property—with any degree of certainty, and the endless disputes which would spring from a revendication of them—

As we find well illustrated in this case—have introduced a contrary practice in modern times; and the title of the former owner to all booty is considered as completely divested by a firm possession of the captor of twenty-four hours.

Then he gives the law with reference to real property, which is not relevant to this case.

The next authority we cite on that proposition is volume 3 of Phillimore's International Law, page 504:

With respect to movable property or prizes captured in a war by sea, all such property is vested in the captor. If he part with them to a neutral, the former proprietor is not entitled to claim them.

Then again, on page 509:

Bynkershock, however, agrees with Grotius that movable goods are now, without distinction, subjects of prize, and divested of the privileges of postliminy. As goods captured from the enemy, he argues, vest in the captor, it follows, when recaptured, they vest in the recaptor.

The exception to this we will state in a moment: That the doctrine of postliminy extends the time within which the recapture occurs, but never extends beyond the re-establishment of peace. An amnesty in civil war is the same as a treaty of peace in case of foreign war, and that amnesty occurred before there was any recovery of this property back.

The next authority I cite is Hopner vs. Appleby, 5 Mason, pages 75, 76. I read from the opinion of Judge Story:

The original ownership of the enemy is entirely divested by the capture; and though a title good against all the world may not be conveyed to a neutral vendee by the captors unless there be a regular condemnation as prize, or a treaty of peace which confirms, by implication, the existing title and state of things, yet this does not interfere with the general right of the captors to sell the property or dispose of it as rightful proprietors jure belli and possessors de facto.

Then with reference to the effect of destruction being the same as that of sale:

The captors had a plenary dominion over the property by the capture, and might, so far as she was concerned, have burned or destroyed it, or disposed of it in any other manner which they pleased.

We claim that these authorities establish that by the capture whatever municipal title existed as to any of this property was totally and entirely divested. Then on what ground does the doctrine of subrogation on which the insurance companies claim stand? They are subrogated they say to the rights of the owner of the vessel. I admit it. If there be any spes recuperandi the insurance companies are rightly by law subrogated to it; but if there be no spes recuperandi, they are not subrogated.

Now, if the title was utterly and entirely extinguished as to the owner of the vessel from the time of her capture, what was there of spes recuperandi as to which these insurance companies can be subrogated? They insured under the laws of war; they took the risks of a state of war, as well its laws as its arms. You might conceive one of the insurance agents going to a ship-owner and stating the price of insurance. The ship-owner might object that the price was too high. The agent would reply that they had to take the risk of the property being captured, and if it was captured there would be no spes recuperandi. That is doubtless the way the insurance agents talked, and it is good law. They assumed the risks of war when they charged war premiums. This is one of the very risks they bargained for, because the law of the land enters into and constitutes a part of every contract.

Then these parties, knowing that in the event of capture the title of the owner was forever gone, charged for that and received their pay for it; so that they have neither law nor equity upon which to base their alleged right of subrogation.

Subrogation never exists as to a mere moral or imperfect right. We may illustrate that in this way: A wealthy father might advise his son to enter into some commercial enterprise regarded as likely to be remunerative. The son, upon the advice of the father, enters into the undertaking and perhaps insures the vessel in which he ships his cargo abroad. That vessel is lost. In that event would there be such a thing as subrogating the insurance company to the moral right which the father might feel to be his duty to recognize in reference to re-imbursing his son? Subrogation does not exist in regard to moral right.

These parties made their contract on the very basis that in case the vessel was captured their spes recuperandi was gone. They made a war premium fit for that risk. They have neither in equity nor in law a right to claim anything more than any other citizen should claim. That is, if they have actually lost they shall be re-imbursed. The Treasury Department of the United States under all circumstances has always denied that insurance companies were entitled to subrogation. In support of that I quote from page 133 of the Digest of Decisions of the Second Comptroller, section 974:

Certain steamboats while impressed into the military service of the United States were destroyed by fire, without any fault or negligence of the owners. The risks taken by the underwriters were liquidated and paid for, and claim by them, as subrogated to all the rights of the assured, made under the act of March 3, 1849, for the amount thus paid; but it was held that the principle of equitable subrogation applied only in favor of the Government, the underwriters, as for the owners, having by their policies of insurance pro tanto agreed to incur the risk.

Therefore, as a fact, if they had taken pains to inquire independently of the law which they were bound to know, they would have found that subrogation was never recognized in such cases.

And here it may not be malapropos to refer to a discussion which occurred in the Senate. The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] for whose character and judgment alike I have a regard closely bordering upon reverence, I apprehend was misled somewhat in his judgment in this case by a case which he there cited. And the same view was taken by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. KNOTT] in this dicussion. That was the case of Comegys vs. Vasse:

A ship that was insured was illegally captured by the Spaniards. In the course of time Vasse became bankrupt, &c.

That is, the ship was illegally captured by the Spaniards. If in time of peace a nation with whom we are at peace captures a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, that is an illegal capture; but if the vessel is captured by a nation with which we are at war, then it is a legal capture. This case of Comegys vs. Vasse turned upon the legalty of the capture. The right of subrogation was admitted in that case because there was a distinct, living, tangible right and title in the party who had been wronged by the illegal capture. The ruling in that case is entirely inappropriate to this, in that under the law of nations this was a legal capture, and divested the municipal title. Whereas in the case of the Spanish capture that was an illegal capture, and the municipal title continued to live just as much after the capture as before. It was a change of property in possession to property in action only; the right of property existed the same after the illegal capture as before.

But the right of property did not continue to exist in the case of these vessels captured by the confederates, because that capture was made in a state of war. I think, therefore, the Spanish case misled to some extent the judgments of those who are usually so thoroughly informed and for whose opinion we have such unbounded respect.

We claim, then, that there was no municipal title left in any one as to which there could be any subrogation. Then how does that award stand? Just in this position: it was recovered for a breach of neutral duty, recovered by the United States against Great Britain, not upon any municipal title, but upon the national paramount title of the United States as a sovereign. Then what should be done with this money? The nation should be simply and fully just; if there be one single dollar that should be paid back to Great Britain it should go back there, because justice is our highest duty. But there is no evidence and no inference to be derived from anything that has transpired in the present examination as to any injustice having been done to Great Britain. We are to assume, as we would with reference to any court, that those who acted upon this case considered it carefully; that they were honest and competent, and that they rendered judgment for no more than was right. Unless somebody establishes affirmatively that the tribunal did give judgment for more than was destroyed, we owe no duties to Great Britain so far as that question is concerned.

Then as to the claims of citizens, the fund is left in the possession of the United States to be distributed to those who according to the policy of the nation and the principles of natural justice would be entitled to receive it. The national policy is to encourage commerce. This fund is just as free for distribution as are the vessels captured by United States men-of-war. The capture of any prize by a United States vessel during war vests the title in the United States; but we have passed certain laws by which the Government distributes this as prize-money among seamen in recognition of the meritorious service of those whose valor has won it. This is our policy with the view of maintaining energy, vigor, and gallantry in our Navy.

Now this fund stands in just the same relation. Here is property vested in the United States by virtue of her paramount title. It is her interest and her duty to distribute it to that branch of industry from which it has been derived. We desire to encourage commerce. The Government invited citizens under her flag to go into all parts of the world. They rendered to her the duty of allegiance; she promised to them the correlative duty of protection. She really had entered into the obligation to protect these parties who had invested in commerce and whose merchandise was destroyed or who were obliged to pay war premiums. Then her duty is to perform that promise. The promise was made as much to one as to another. The Government is bound now, as I understand, by no kind of municipal title, but is simply bound to do that which national policy, national honor, or the principles of simple, natural justice may dictate.

Having invited her citizens to enter thus into commerce, which is one of the great sources of our national wealth, it was the duty of the Government to protect that commerce. She was unable to protect it at that time because of the civil war. She has now recovered a fund from which to furnish indemnity in lieu of the protection she owed.

But it will be asked, "Why not give it to all our citizens or leave it in the Treasury as a common fund?" Because these parties, in consideration of the invitation of the Government to enter into commerce, risked and lost that which others did not. The parties who owned these vessels performed every duty that any other citizen performed; but they ran this additional risk and incurred this additional loss. The Government owed to them this additional protection, which it failed to give them. Hence they are entitled to be remunerated. Those who lost vessels which were not, as they say, inculpated—but in my view of the case it is unimportant whether they were inculpated or exculpated, because there is no title to this fund in any citizen—those who lost vessels which were destroyed by these cruisers before they were inculpated were just as much invited to enter into this commerce as those that were destroyed by cruisers after they were inculpated. We might take a single illustration, the Delphine. Before the Shenandoah passed into Melbourne she was alleged to be exculpated; after she passed into Melbourne and came out she was inculpated. She destroyed the Delphine perhaps twenty-four hours before she went into Melbourne; and twenty-four hours afterward she destroyed another vessel. Now the duty of the Government toward the owner of the Delphine was just as high as toward the other vessel. The right of protection was just the same in each case. Both parties had rendered the same allegiance; both incurred the same loss; hence natural equity says that they should receive the same compensation. Therefore I would from this fund make compensation to all those who actually lost ships and to whom the United States owed protection.

Then again, with reference to the war-premium claimants. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in his remarks on this subject, said that this war-premium business was a bet on their part. Not at all; it was a contract, with all the relations, provisions, and incidents of a contract. He says it was entered into in order that the owner of the ship might sleep soundly at night. But the insured gave his allegiance to his Government that he might sleep soundly at night. Perhaps he took his gun upon his shoulder and risked his life that he might sleep soundly at night. Why, then, should he be required to pay this additional sum that he might sleep soundly at night? For he has paid all that anybody else had paid for the same thing. But it may be alleged that this was a voluntary payment. If it was a voluntary payment and a reckless one, it would not be justifiable to re-imburse him; but if it was a voluntary payment, such as an ordinarily-prudent business man would regard as justifiable and necessary and warranted by the circumstances, he had a right to make this payment and has a right now to his share of this fund, because the Government owed to him this protection which he had to provide for himself.

Or we might arrive at the conclusion by another way. If the doctrine of subrogation—which as a legal doctrine does not exist in the case—be recognized, it might be said to the insurance companies: "Why not subrogate one step further and make compensation to the man who lost instead of him who made the money? Why not subrogate the man who re-imbursed you to your right?" But the true ground upon which to place this question is that of the correlative duties of allegiance and protection; and these men were entitled to protection without paying their war premiums, so that they might sleep soundly at night, as the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee has stated. So that these two classes of claimants are entitled to their share of this fund, and entitled justly.

Then the third class which my amendment would leave provision at some future time for bringing in as a separate element are those who suffered actual physical or bodily loss in these transactions. He who lost a hand or a limb is just as much a sufferer as he who lost a vessel, and ought to be re-imbursed just as much. Hence my amendment provides that after paying the two classes to which I have adverted, the balance shall remain in the Treasury to be distributed by future congressional legislation to those other parties who have suffered direct losses from which the Government, if able, should have protected them.

These are the views we have with reference to this whole transaction: first, this money was recovered upon the paramount title of the nation, and upon no individual title; second, there was no municipal or individual title in existence at the time of its recovery, and, as a consequence from that, there can be no subrogation; and third, the correlative duties of protection and allegiance require that that class of men who suffered from these cruisers, when others did not, should have this indemnity extended to them in order to repair their loss, because we did not prevent them from suffering it.

So we claim, then, this is the course which should be adopted. We stand as a sovereign, above every municipal law or technicality. We own this fund simply to do right. The nation, according to the ancient view of a sovereign, was endowed with the right or prerogative of personal dignity. That is the special pre-eminence which the sovereign has above all other persons and the ordinary course of law by right of sovereign dignity. We stand above the ordinary course of law to look upon this whole field in its full breadth, standing, as it were, as the vicegerent of the Creator himself to do just what is right and make whole every one who has lost in this transaction. We are not to view it through any translucent medium of municipal law, but through the transparent ether of absolute distinct natural justice.

We ask this House, then, to adopt the amendments we have introduced, so that instead of turning over to insurance companies who have already made a large amount of money, or if they have not, the present law re-imburses all they have lost, leave it to those who have suffered absolute personal loss or any other direct loss which may have been or may be shown to have taken place

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain what is the difference between the proposition he advocates and the present law and the act of the last Congress.

Mr. JENKS. The act of the last Congress only provided that those whose vessels had been destroyed by the inculpated cruisers should receive their pay—that is, by those they claimed or thought had entered into the award—and also to pay insurance companies all the loss they had been subjected to both by the destruction of the vessels which were destroyed by the inculpated or exculpated cruisers in excess of the war premiums. This goes further and provides for all vessels which were actually destroyed by the confederate cruisers.

Mr. LORD. On the high seas.

Mr. JENKS. On the high seas, of course; and those who have paid war premiums, that is, those who had to furnish their own protection outside of that the Government was able to give them. The balance, I say, should remain for future disposition.

Mr. BLAND. Does it pay the actual loss to the war-premium men or what they have not been paid back?

Mr. JENKS. Of course this bill only pays the actual loss to war-premium men. As I view this, there is no right in any man to claim any profit upon this whatever. It is only the loss which should be re-imbursed, because profit must be the result of legal right, and, as there is no legal right, nothing but imperfect right for any one to go upon or moral duty, there can be claimed no profit by one man as against another in this distribution.

Mr. MILLS. Did the insurance companies pay for the vessels which were destroyed by the confederate cruisers?

Mr. JENKS. They paid for some of them, and they claim the whole fund in consideration of having paid for them.

Mr. MILLS. Do they claim the whole fund in consideration of having paid for part of them?

Mr. JENKS. For vessels destroyed by the inculpated vessels which they had insured.

Mr. MILLS. Do any owners of any of the vessels which had been insured and received their insurance claim any part of it?

Mr. JENKS. They do not, as I understand it.

Mr. MILLS. Only those who were not insured?

Mr. JENKS. Only those who were not insured are claiming any portion of the fund, as I understand it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand the gentleman to have said in the course of his remarks that at the time these commissioners met at Geneva, where they determined upon the amount due from the British government to the Government of the United States, these individual claims had not been presented?

Mr. JENKS. I say the individual titles were not considered. It was only upon the paramount title of the nation they passed, and there was no individual title before the tribunal.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. But there must have been some consideration of the various claims made.

Mr. JENKS. Only as to the value of the vessels.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Before the amount was fixed how did they arrive at any amount which was supposed to be due from the government of Great Britain?

Mr. JENKS. They fixed it by the value of the vessels which were actually destroyed.

Mr. LORD. And their cargoes.

Mr. JENKS. Yes; by the value of the vessels and cargoes destroyed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Did they not take into account individual claims?

Mr. JENKS. They never did; as I understand it, they only took into account the nation's claim by virtue of her paramount title, and no individual title was before that tribunal or could have been there. And there was no individual title in existence to present there. That is what I have endeavored to demonstrate.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I understand that a great many individual claims have been admitted and agreed to be paid. Now the gentleman contends, as I understand him—for I did not hear all his remarks—that if there is a balance of this amount of fifteen millions and no further claims are admitted to be just and due, then it should remain as belonging to the United States Government?

Mr. JENKS. It would remain, provided there are no losses that the United States ought to compensate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Just allow me another question. Suppose there should be no claim and that a balance was left of four or five million dollars?

Mr. JENKS. It would belong to the United States, unless some other just claim thereto should appear.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman hold that it should be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. JENKS. I hold nothing about that now, as the fact does not yet appear.

Mr. PIERCE obtained the floor and yielded to

Mr. MILLIKEN, who moved that the House adjourn.

"Not to exceed one thousand to said States, each, and not more than five hundred to each of said Territories."

In line 4, after the words "shall be," insert the word "only."

At the end of the joint resolution insert as follows:

"Provided, however, That said arms shall be issued only in the following manner and upon the following conditions, namely: Upon the requisition of the governors of said States or Territories, showing the absolute necessity of arms for the protection of the citizens and their property against Indian raids into said States or Territories; also, that militia companies are regularly organized and under the control of said States or Territories to which such arms are to be issued, and that such governor or governors shall give a good and sufficient bond for the return of said arms, or payment for the same, at such time as the Secretary of War may designate."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. GOODIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOODIN. I also ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, with an amendment by the Senate, and to move that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert these words: "Provided, That no proceedings shall be taken under this act until the said Kansas Indians shall file their assent thereto with the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. GOODIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Edwin Rogers, postmaster at North Adams, Massachusetts, praying the passage of a law relieving him from liability for the amount of certain postage-stamps alleged to have been stolen from his office in May, 1876, without any carelessness on the part of himself or his clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of A. H. Hamilton, a citizen of Indiana, praying that the road from Monroe post-office, Adams County, Indiana, to Salem, Adams County, Indiana, be declared a post-route; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise, Mr. President, to perform this morning a most grateful duty, touching a subject peculiarly appropriate as I think to the centennial year of American Independence.

The surviving Kentucky soldiers of 1812 are in the habit of meeting together at some spot in that Commonwealth once during every year for social and personal communion. To them this reunion is an occasion full of interest and filled with mellowed memories. A few days ago forty-five of the remnant of this brave band, who sixty-four years ago fled to the rescue of the northwest frontier of this country, met at Paris, Kentucky. Of that number there were but two or three who had not exceeded the prescribed limit of man's allotted four score years.

The paper which I hold in my hand contains the name and age of every old soldier present at their last meeting and exhibits the interesting fact of their remarkable longevity.

On the occasion of their late reunion these veterans passed resolutions asking Congress to consider the propriety of speedy action upon a pending bill extending pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 not now provided for by existing law, and also to embrace the widows of such as are dead who are not now upon the pension-list. They appointed J. G. Chinn, John Martin, and Jeremiah Duncan, venerable men of the highest worth and personally known to me, to bring their action before Congress. It gives me pleasure and I esteem it an honor to do so.

In a few years these brave men and women who have as yet never been placed upon the pension-list will have passed away. Let their eyes not close without some recognition of their services by their country.

I present their petition, which I ask may be read, and I trust that Congress will accede promptly by appropriate legislation to the request of the petitioners.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, your petitioners, respectfully represent, that at a reunion of the soldiers of the war of 1812, at Paris, Kentucky, on the 19th day of June, 1876, the following soldiers of said war were present:

Jeremiah Duncan aged 84, Frank Hardesty 86, E. Pendleton 87, Hamilton Wilson 84, William Wright 93, and James Renick 82, Bourbon County; Robert Carrack aged 81, General Leslie Combs 82, Dr. J. G. Chinn 79, and Robert M. Campbell 83, Fayette County; Lewis H. Ball aged 82, George Blake 81, Colonel William Hamilton 84, Samuel Rogers 87, and Gilead Evans 81, Nicholas County; Benjamin Moore aged 85, William Harris 85, A. Edelman 85, G. H. Perrin 81, J. R. Curry 87, Michael Goodnight 80, and Joseph Stone 85, Harrison County; Robert McFarland aged 82, and Theophilus Hendricks 85, Bath County; Daniel Priest aged 81, and Moore Johnson 81, Montgomery County; Leonard Beall aged 80, James Chism 89, and John Martin 79, Clark County; George Davis aged 81, Mercer County; E. P. Hudnut aged 82, John Lamb 85, Peter Lashbrook 83, and Squire J. McCarthey 85, Mason County; Samuel Jones aged 84, Fleming County; John Portwood aged 88, Jessamine County; Innis B. Payne aged 83, Campbell County; Thomas Casey aged 79, Pendleton County; B. Calvin aged 85, Bracken County; Joshua Webb aged 84, Madison County; S. M. Berry aged 80, Scott County; W. W. Allen aged 85, Franklin County; Hosea Paul aged 85, and George Adamson 85, Aberdeen, Ohio; Charles Warren aged 88, Kearney, Missouri.

That in pursuance of a resolution unanimously adopted by said body, your petitioners were appointed a committee to urge upon Congress the propriety of taking some speedy action in relation to granting pensions to the widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812, and also to embrace such soldiers as were excluded by the former act of Congress.

All of the surviving widows of the deceased soldiers of said war are very far advanced in years and cannot, at the most, long survive. Many of them, too, are in a very needy condition, and the small sum proposed to be given them as a pension would render great assistance to them in their declining years.

Your petitioners, therefore, in behalf of the above-mentioned widows, earnestly request that your honorable bodies will speedily pass the bill (H. R. No. 2454) for amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows.

Your petitioners further request that Congress will speedily allow the back pension of General Leslie Combs from the 5th of May, 1813, the date of his disability, up to the 22d day of December, 1833, the time his pension began by special act of Congress.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

J. G. CHINN,
JOHN MARTIN,
JEREMIAH DUNCAN,
Committee.

Mr. INGALLS. The petition presented by the Senator from Kentucky might possibly leave upon the Senate the impression that the soldiers of the war of 1812 are not now admitted to the pension-rolls. Every soldier who served sixty days in that war, and every surviving widow of a soldier who was married prior to the treaty of peace, is already entitled to a pension under the law now in force on that subject. The bill of the House of Representatives to which the petition refers has already been reported by the Senate Committee on Pensions and is now upon the Calendar. I therefore move that the petition lie on the table instead of being referred.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also has the very agreeable duty of laying before the Senate the credentials which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials of HENRY B. ANTHONY, elected by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1877.

The credentials were ordered to be filed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARVEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 566) granting relief to Mrs. Sarah Spaulding, of Bay City, Michigan, to report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That matter ought to be explained, at least, the bill still remaining subject to objection.

Mr. HARVEY. A report accompanies the bill, and also an affidavit. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read, the bill being yet subject to objection.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CROUNSE from the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives February 18:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 566) for the relief Mrs. Sarah Spaulding, of Bay City, Michigan, would report:

That in the spring of the year 1862 Lovel F. Spaulding, then husband of Sarah Spaulding, desirous of possessing himself of a small island of some six acres, supposed to be undisposed public land, applied to the proper land office at Marquette, Michigan, with a view to securing it. He was advised by the register, as appears from that officer's letter, dated May 13, 1872, that the same was not subject to purchase, but was open to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws. He thereupon filed his application, paid the required fee, as is shown by the receiver's receipt of May 25, 1872, went upon the land, cultivated a portion of it, and built a house thereon. Lovel F. Spaulding died in November, 1872. Subsequently thereto, and in the year 1873, it was discovered that for this same piece of land a patent had been issued to other parties, and that Mrs. Spaulding, as the representative of her late husband, could maintain no rightful claim to it. There is nothing disclosed anywhere which impeaches the good faith of the said Spaulding, or his widow, in the effort to secure this land by settlement under the homestead law. On the contrary, the correspondence of the local land officers, as well as that of a former Commissioner of the General Land Office, shows that it was the understanding of all that the land was open to entry, and through the representations of these officers Spaulding was induced to settle and build upon it. This is further confirmed by a recent letter of the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office to the committee, in which he concludes as follows: "It would seem from all the facts, as herein shown, that he (Spaulding) was misled in making the said entry by false representation as to the status of the land, inadvertently made both by this and the local offices."

In view of these facts, compensation should be given for the value of the improvements made at least. Of such value there is no definite evidence, but the committee thinks that $500 would not be extravagant, and it recommends the passage of the bill allowing that sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I am opposed to the principle of all bills of this character——

Mr. HARVEY. There is an affidavit, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas states that there is another paper, an affidavit, which will be read if the Senator from Vermont will yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I was going to say to save time was to ask to have this bill go over; but I will first say one word, and that is that I do not believe on any just principle the United States or any other government can stand the effect of adopting the principle that where through the negligence of some of its ten thousand agents a party makes a mistake in respect to the title of land that he enters, we are to be responsible as a government for it. There are a great many questions connected with railroads and with Indians that may trouble us if that principle is once acceded to even in the smallest and hardest case, and I concede this to be one of that kind, and I should be very willing, if I had any money, to subscribe to help out the party. But if we admit the principle that the United States is bound to make good all mistakes and misunderstandings about the condition of the public land, we shall find our feet entangled in the claims of sundry railroads and shall be led we know not where, or rather I think I know where, and that is to a very bad end. I suppose, however, that the Senate out of its consideration for this case will pass the bill, and I do not intend to try to prevent its passage, because I suppose it would be useless to do so; but in order that the record may show my own attitude on this subject for the benefit of my own constituents, I ask that the bill may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the present consideration of the bill. One objection carries it over.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to make one or two remarks?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. If the Chair will indulge me, I desire to say that the Committee on Public Lands have not been anxious at any time to have cases referred to them for settlement which almost exclusively in their character partake of the nature of claims against the Government. Claims are presented, and simply because they relate to lands that were once public lands they occasionally get before our committee. The understanding of the Committee on Public Lands is, has been, and I suppose will continue to be, that it has charge of questions of public policy in relation to the disposition of the public lands, the surveys of the public lands, the establishment of land offices, and perhaps the granting of rights of way to private corporations through the public lands, to matters affecting the homestead law, and all questions of scrip and the location of bounty-land warrants upon public lands; but this is one of the few cases coming to us—of late more numerous however than formerly—that partake almost exclusively of the nature of a private claim. The committee in this instance gave this bill favorable consideration, and recommended its passage simply upon the ground of equity. We would far rather that all claims of this description should go to the Committee on Private Land Claims or to the Committee on Claims of this body; but as this claim had reference to what was once public land—a little bit of an island of four or five acres in Lake Huron—and as it appeared to be a case of special hardship, and only involved $500, the committee gave it a favorable consideration, and ask the Senate to pass it. That is about all we can say for it. It would be far better if these claims were sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims. This is not absolutely a question concerning public lands. It is a question concerning the private claim of an individual. Still in this instance we went a little over the rule and recommended it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of S. D. Lee, praying the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 951) removing the political disabilities of Stephen D. Lee, of the State of Mississippi; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of G. T. Beauregard, praying the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 952) to remove the political disabilities of G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 329) to remove the political disabilities of George Jackson, a citizen of West Virginia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 620) to remove the political disabilities of James Argyle Smith, of Mississippi, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John G. Walker, of Texas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 953) to remove the political disabilities of John G. Walker, of Texas; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 890) for the relief of Randall Brown, of Nashville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas B. Wallace, of Lexington, Missouri, praying compensation for property destroyed by the Army under orders from a military commander, reported a bill (S. No. 955) for the relief of Thomas B. Wallace, of Lexington, in the State of Missouri; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2684) to amend sections 246 and 251 of the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 480) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of unserviceable material, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 909) to correct an error in section 1588 of the Revised Statutes, to report a new bill on the subject. It is in reference to the pay of retired officers of the Navy. I reported it the other day, and withdrew the report at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] I ask for its immediate consideration. I called the attention of the Senate to it before. It is simply changing the words "sea-pay" to "highest pay," which mistake was made in copying the law into the Revised Statutes.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 954) to amend section 1588 of the Revised Statutes in reference to the pay of retired officers of the Navy.

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1588, title 15, chapter 8, of the Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 1588. The pay of all officers of the Navy who have been retired after forty-five years' service after reaching the age of sixteen years, or who have been or may be retired after forty years' service upon their own application to the President, or on attaining the age of sixty-two years, or on account of incapacity resulting from long and faithful service, from wounds or injuries received in the line of duty, or from sickness or exposure therein, shall, when not on active duty, be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea-pay provided by this chapter for the grade or rank which they held, respectively, at the time of their retirement. The pay of all other officers on the retired list shall, when not on active duty, be equal to one-half the highest pay provided by this chapter for the grade or rank held by them, respectively, at the time of their retirement.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have that go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will that increase or reduce pay?

Mr. CRAGIN. This is a bill reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. In making up the Revised Statutes a word was left out by the commission, I presume. I have no doubt the bill is all right.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will explain it. It is to change one-half of a compound word, to make the Revised Statutes conform to the law as it was.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have that go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

TRANSCRIPTS OF TERRITORIAL RECORDS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 924) to provide for furnishing certified transcripts of territorial records, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I presume there will be no objection to the bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It makes it lawful for each secretary of the several Territories of the United States to receive for all certified copies of records and papers in his official custody furnished by him to any person for private use a fee of fifteen cents for each one hundred words for such copy and fifty cents for his official certificate thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Fifteen cents per hundred words is too much.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not in the distant Territories, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ten cents is enough; but I do not object to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 956) to establish a post-road in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 957) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the administration of justice in the Territory of Arizona; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of Mrs. S. E. Thompson, of Green County, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 959) releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to the assignees of John Cutler; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections some time since, providing for the compensation to be paid to P. B. S. Pinchback, late a contestant for a seat in this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he was a contestant up to the period of the determination of the contest by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. WHYTE. Does an objection carry this resolution over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the resolution has been heretofore reported.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope the resolution will not be taken up at this time. It is a matter which involves no subject of a party character; but a great many Senators are absent who have made pairs on political subjects, and who would like, I know, to be heard on this resolution. I hope, therefore, it will not be taken up at this time.

Mr. MORTON. I hope it will be taken up; it is a matter of justice that it should be. It has been put off several times because it was said Senators were absent. The session is now drawing to a close. This matter ought to be settled, and I hope there will be no objection to taking it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire what the Senator from Maryland said on the subject of taking up the resolution. I understood it was something about some persons being absent, although I was not able to hear him fully.

Mr. WHYTE. I said, Mr. President, that there were Senators absent who had expressed some opinions in regard to this resolution, who I am sure would like to be heard upon it. They are paired upon questions of a political character, and as this is not one of that character I did hope that for a day or two it might be postponed until those gentlemen could be back in their seats.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The thing ought to be disposed of undoubtedly, in justice to the claimant, although I do not know what rule ought to be applied about it. Unless there is some special reason against taking it up, I should be quite willing to have it taken up now and disposed of in some way.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that, if it was not for the fact that there is a very great probability that if this resolution is not taken up now it will not be reached during the present session, I should of course consent to allow it to go over; but I have been urged by several gentlemen on this side of the House, at all events by members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to call this matter up, and I have felt in duty bound to do so. I hope it will be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether this resolution is unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think not. My impression is that at least one member of the committee is opposed to the report.

Mr. WRIGHT. Only one member?

Mr. MITCHELL. One, and perhaps two. My impression, however, is at this time that there was but one.

Mr. WRIGHT. The reason I made the inquiry was this: I find that three members of the committee belonging to the opposition are absent from the Chamber this morning; whether they are absent from the city or not I do not know; but it occurred to me that, if the report was not unanimous, as a matter of courtesy it would be well to consider the propriety of laying it over. I make no objection myself to taking it up, but three members of the committee belonging to the opposition as I understand are absent from the Chamber this morning. I do not know what their views may be upon this question, whether they concurred in the report or not. For myself, I will not oppose taking it up, and merely suggest to the Senator having the resolution in charge the inquiry whether, they being absent, it would or would not be proper to take it up. That is the only question in my mind.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state in justice to myself and in answer to what the Senator from Iowa has said, that at the time this report was made, which was on the 17th of April, one member of the committee now absent requested that the matter should not be called up in his absence. I at that time gave him my word that it should not be. Since that, while that member of the committee was present, I moved to take up the resolution, to which he objected. He is now absent at Saint Louis attending the convention there. I telegraphed him some days since that, owing to the fact that the session was about to come to a close or that there was danger of it at least, I would pair with him on this question, but felt it to be a duty I owed Mr. Pinchback and the Senate and the committee from which it is reported to call it up.

Mr. MORTON. One word. If there had been any surprise about this matter to anybody, it would not be proper to call it up now; but it cannot be postponed very much longer. I think it can be disposed of very readily, and I hope there will be no objection to taking it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that it be not called up till Monday, to give everybody time and opportunity to be here. It ought to be considered, and I suppose Senators will feel that under the circumstances any further delay after this week ought not to be asked.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall have no objection to taking it up on Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt, if the Senator from Vermont will accept that suggestion, and let it go over to Monday, it can be taken up without objection and a vote had.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we shall not be here on Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be. Tuesday will be the 4th of July.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. We had better dispose of it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be taken up at the first opportunity after this week.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senators who are not present are paired. I am myself paired with one of them. I think we had better take it up now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I insist on a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to understand the ground on which the objection is stated. If the objection is on the ground of courtesy to absent Senators, who desire to be heard on this matter, I think we had better postpone it to some day next week, when it shall be taken up by general consent.

Mr. MORTON. We may not be here next week.

Mr. ANTHONY. We shall be here week after next.

Mr. SHERMAN. Considering that the impeachment trial is fixed for next week and that Fourth of July comes in next week, I do not know, unless there is some particular Senator absent who desires to be heard, why we should not go on now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no doubt about the resolution itself. I am in favor of treating a man of one color the same as we do a man of another, and there has been no case since I have been here where a contestant who came with a fair right to come has been refused his pay. We gave to a Senator from Georgia $10,000 for sitting five days, and there was not a word of objection raised. If Senators on the other side are absent who desire to be heard, I certainly would put it off on their account.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope this resolution will go over. I want it acted on, but not to-day. There are Senators who desire to be heard upon it, I am certain, who have gone away, believing that nothing like a political question would be taken up in their absence. It is problematical whether this is a political question or not, but they no doubt desire to express their views on it; and I hope that according to the courtesy which usually prevails in the Senate this question will not be taken up until their return. I am willing to agree that it shall be taken up on Monday next, or any day after that. I desire a fair vote upon it; I do not desire to delay it at all. It seems to me that it ought not to be taken up now when the Senate is so thin. If it is a political question, and you count the pairs, I doubt whether we have a quorum. I will not say that it is a political question, or whether it is not; but I am sure a great many who have gone away and are paired will regard it as such. It should be sufficient, it seems to me, to justify the postponement.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. As I said, I am paired on this question; at least I am paired on all political questions; and from the turn this seems to take, I suppose this will be so regarded; and, therefore, I shall not vote. I am perfectly willing to take the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky with this condition, that we take this case up on next Monday week. Everybody will be here then. Let this motion be withdrawn now and let us agree among ourselves that next Monday week we will take up this question of Pinchback's compensation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? As a matter of courtesy to those who are absent, if we can have a general understanding that on next Saturday morning we will take up this question, I shall be willing to let it go over until that time. That will give ample time for all those Senators who are absent at Saint Louis to return. If we can have that general understanding I will withdraw my motion to take it up at this time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am willing to take Saturday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to having this question considered on Saturday next instead of to-day? The Chair hears none, and it is so settled.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the consent of the Senate to have the private pension cases on the Calendar considered during the remainder of the morning hour.

HARRIET C. DUNHAM.

Mr. INGALLS. The next is House bill No. 2804.

The bill (H. R. No. 2804) granting a pension to Harriet C. Dunham, widow of Charles A. Dunham, late private Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale;

A bill (H. R. No. 3495) for the relief of the mail contractors on route 1y319, in Tennessee; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 129) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the first amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, and had agreed to the second amendment of the Senate to the resolution, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SUSAN E. RHEA.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask leave to call up the bill (H. R. No. 590) for the relief of Mrs. Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. J. Burrows Gardiner. It is a small bill, which can be soon disposed of.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the bill is taken up I should like to have the report read. What is the special necessity of taking that up at the present time?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from Maryland will state the case.

Mr. WHYTE. I hardly think there will be any dispute about the bill after the statement is made. This is a House bill, which was reported favorably by the Committee on Naval Affairs, but without any written report. The case is of this character: When the annexation of Texas took place, as will be remembered by the Senator from Vermont, the armament and some material connected with the Texan navy were turned over to the United States, and there was an implied understanding that some arrangement would be made for the benefit of the officers of the Texan navy. They came here immediately after the annexation and applied to Congress to put them on the rolls of the United States Navy, and for years they stood at the doors of Congress asking that this might be done for them. Finally, in 1857, a bill was passed granting to all the surviving officers of the Texan navy five years of leave pay, the same pay that officers of the United States Navy were entitled to when on leave. That bill passed both Houses, and those living were paid. It appears that Dr. Gardiner was——

Mr. SHERMAN. I regret to interrupt my friend from Maryland, but if this is done in one case it will be in others, and I must rise to a question of order. It is not in order to discuss the merits of the proposition on a motion of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must call for the unfinished business. The Senator can call up this bill at some more opportune moment.

Mr. WHYTE. I was merely responding to an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont and stating what the ground of the claim was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, to take up the bill which has been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question is, Shall we postpone the pending bill. I feel it my duty to stand by that bill, although it is getting in bad shape for me, but it is my duty to stand by it, and I call for the yeas and nays, if Senators insist on thrusting in other questions. It is one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the morning hour had expired, but with the consent of the Senate continued with the cases under the charge of the Senator from Kansas, at the close of which the Senator from Kentucky asked the consideration of this bill, and the Chair asked the Clerk to read it for information, no objection being raised. The question is on taking it up, unless the Senator from Ohio insists on the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do insist on the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is equivalent to a motion for postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio having called for the regular order, which is House bill No. 3398, the unfinished business, does the Senator from Kentucky move its postponement?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir, I do not make that motion. The case can be called up again, I suppose.

LEGAL TENDER OF SILVER COIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is House bill No. 3398.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3398) for the issue of coin, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BOGY to the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out "not exceeding $20," in line 14 of section 1; so as to make the clause read:

> And the said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender at its nominal value for any amount in any one payment, except for customs duties and interest on the public debt, and shall be receivable in payment of all dues to the United States except duties on imports.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to make a motion about this bill. Referring to proceedings which have occurred in another place, I will say in order to be parliamentary, I think the wise thing to do, after the light we have got from the discussion of this subject, is to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, in order that, in connection with what has been done in another place and has come over and is now on the table, they may reconsider this whole subject and present us a bill which I cannot but hope will be satisfactory to everybody. Therefore, Mr. President, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance, in order that they may have the whole subject, with the House bill that I understand has come over which involves the same general considerations, before them. Let them perfect a measure on the whole subject, and report in a way that we shall be able then to understand and have decisive action upon the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall have no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, except that the Committee on Finance have considered every phase and branch of this question. If any member of the Committee on Finance really thinks any new light can be thrown on the controversy, I shall make no objection to the recommittal; and there are members of the committee present. I do not believe myself that a further examination by the Committee on Finance, especially in the absence of two of its prominent members from the city on business of the Senate, would be of any avail. The bill as it now stands before us represents the will of the Committee on Finance as near as it can be got at, and if the report of that committee could have any influence upon any Senator, certainly the fact that we have gone just as far in favor of those who want to issue silver money as it is possible to do, as it is prudent to do, or as it is politic to do, ought to weigh with members of the Senate who have not examined the matter so fully. Now, therefore, unless some member of the Committee on Finance desires to reconsider his action on this matter I do not see any use of referring it again.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is advisable that this subject should not be pressed to a vote at this time. As I understand it, the House of Representatives have sent us a bill making the silver dollar a universal legal tender, except for duties on customs. We have been levying our customs duties in gold on the pledge that our securities were to be paid in gold. This seems to be not in harmony with that action. At all events, this is the most important question that has been before the Senate at this session. We have just postponed a question involving some twelve or fifteen thousand dollars because the Senate was not full; we have a bare quorum here; and I certainly think the interests of the country require, whether this subject is referred to the committee or not, that we shall have a full Senate present when it is acted upon.

Mr. MORTON. I think under the circumstances this bill ought to be recommitted. The first section of the amendment reported by the committee, and especially the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, involves considerations of a most important character, looking as I believe to a total change in our financial system, looking as I believe, in substance, to the establishment of a new dollar, worth from fifteen to twenty cents less than the dollar now established by law; and, as I think the subject is imperfectly understood, I believe it will be better to recommit the bill again to the committee.

There is another bill now on our table which makes a silver dollar, worth only 85 cents or 82 cents, a legal tender in payment of all public and private debts, a change so important and momentous that we are hardly able to comprehend it. It is not a question whether we will resume specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, or at any other time. No question of that kind is involved; but it is simply a question as to whether we shall change our dollar, whether we shall start upon a new system fundamentally. I shall therefore vote to recommit the bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to say that I have consulted one or two members of the Committee on Finance, and as a bill on the subject has come from the House of Representatives, I ask that it be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the joint resolution referred to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 22, 1876.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the first amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

Resolved, That the House concur in the second amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, with an amendment, as follows: Add to said amendment—

SEC. 3. That, in addition to the amount of subsidiary coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints, and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to the amount of $20,000,000.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion required for this purpose shall be purchased, from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the resulting coin may be issued in the ordinary disbursement of the Treasury; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue as herein provided without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury, as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $1,000,000: And it is further provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar of the value, weight, and fineness in use January 1, 1861; and said dollar shall be a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is manifest that those amendments must be referred to the Committee on Finance, I think now the bill and all had better go together. I am perfectly willing to agree to the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the pending bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, to be reported back as early as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I know the intention is to get the bill before the committee and perfect the two measures as much as possible and perhaps consolidate them; but I merely wish it understood by the Senate when the bills are referred, to which course I have no objection, that the committee will report them back as soon as practicable to the Senate after action by the committee. I do not presume there will be any disposition not to do that; but inasmuch as there is not a full committee here action might be objected to until we should have a full committee. I do not want delay. I only want an understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have heard that our absent members will be here this week.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope so. I have no objection to the reference, but I want it understood that it is to be reported back as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to commit.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to be heard on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On committing the House bill?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the motion is simply to refer the House bill, I have nothing to say; but if the motion is to refer the pending bill I desire to be heard.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood the motion of the Senator from Ohio to be to recommit the pending bill and the House bill also. I make that motion, if he did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must be so, because my motion was to recommit the pending bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish, before this matter goes to the committee, to say a few words upon a substitute which I had the honor to offer the other day for the Senate committee's silver bill, so that the substitute may go to the committee with the other bills and pending propositions.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said of late in this country and a great deal of nonsense uttered in reference to money as a measure of value. And those who consider it only as a measure of value have compared it to a yard-stick—to which my friend the Senator from Indiana humorously referred yesterday—and have drawn the conclusion that because it makes no difference what the yard measure is made of, so that its length remains the same, so it can make no difference of what substance money is composed, so that it has the value stamped upon it by the law which shall compel its acceptance as money or in the place of money; and that paper, leather, or wood might be made to circulate permanently as money at any value the Government might see fit to stamp upon it. And if it were true that money is only a measure of value, this might also be true. But the experience of the world has shown what every man of ordinary reasoning powers and in his normal condition cannot fail to discover, that nothing can long be recognized as money which is, not at the same time, an equivalent as well as a measure of value; and therefore that nothing can of itself be made actual money which has not, by the very material of which it is composed, a real and equal value in the market aside from and beyond its mere use as money. Anything which has such value independent of its use as money might be used to some extent as money. But to make it proper for use as money, its value compared to the weight, quantity, and portability of the material must be such as to meet the convenience of trade and commerce; and the material should at the same time be as little liable to fluctuation in value as possible. Nothing meets these requisites so well as the precious metals, gold and silver. And if paper or mere promises to pay also circulate as money, its value will always be in proportion to the probability of its conversion into such metallic money at the will of the holder, since the paper as such is of no practical value.

If the relative value of gold and silver to each other was or could be made fixed and permanent, there would be no difficulty in making both a standard or measure, and at the same time an equivalent of value, and no confusion would arise from the double standard. But this relative value is not, and cannot be made, permanent It is constantly fluctuating, and a very small fluctuation, say to the amount of a quarter of 1 per cent., will often, as to large sums, lead to speculations, disturb the steadiness of the money market, and lead to the exportation of one or the other metal.

Either of these metals might be made the standard and measure of value. And if now starting de novo, this Government might make silver the standard instead of gold, though it is less portable, and therefore less convenient in any large commercial transactions. This consideration naturally gives, and should give, the preference to gold, unless by the law of supply and demand its real value, as compared to other articles or things of value, is much more variable than that of silver. Now both are, no doubt, variable in this respect; but I think upon the whole that of gold has not proved more so than that of silver for a long series of years; and that therefore its greater convenience and portability in comparison to value, makes it the preferable standard for a commercial nation like ours.

As the law now stands silver coinage is a legal tender to the amount of only $5; gold is the standard and measure of value and a legal tender to any amount. And a double standard of value of silver and gold, each independent of the other, and without making the value of the one dependent upon the ratio of value it may bear to the other in the markets of the world, could be productive of nothing but chaos. I take it for granted, therefore, that gold, the gold coinage of the United States, will, and ought to, continue the legal standard and measure of values. The standard of our silver coinage, by which I mean its weight and fineness and its nominal value as now fixed by law, is far above its real, comparative, or market value as compared to the gold standard fixed by law for our gold coinage. For obvious reasons this standard of silver coins and their nominal value were purposely fixed slightly above the real value at the time the law fixing its value was passed. But from the greater demand for gold, the increased supply of silver, and the fact that Germany has lately in effect demonetized silver, and from various other causes, silver has of late been getting of less and less value as compared with gold, until it has now reached a point of depreciation about equal to that of the United States notes or greenbacks, or a little less, say about 14 or 15 per cent.

And now, when in my view—which seems to me to be also the general sense of the nation—nothing like permanent prosperity can be hoped for until the resumption of specie payments, and no step has been taken to fund the greenbacks or to redeem them by an issue of bonds at a low rate of interest and on long time, which, in my opinion, is the speediest means of reaching resumption and of bringing the greenbacks up to par—it is quite apparent to my own mind that resumption without such funding of the greenbacks, cannot be brought about by the time now fixed by law, if we are to rely upon gold alone or upon that and such aid as may be got from silver under the present or any limitation of the amount for which it is or may be made a legal tender; and that to accomplish the desired result silver must, in some way, be made a legal tender without limitation as to amount: and this must be done in some way without making it the standard of value as we have made gold—in other words, without adopting a double standard. This manifestly cannot be done by making the silver coins, at their present standard or nominal value, a legal tender for an unlimited amount or any very large amount, for this standard or nominal value is too far above its real or market value as compared with the gold coin, which is the standard of real value; and it cannot therefore be made a legal tender for any very large sums without great injustice, nor without an overwhelming tendency—by a law superior to any law of Congress—to expel gold from general circulation: because no one will pay in gold, which costs him more, when he can pay in silver, which costs him less in the market; and the gold would, therefore, be exported, except so far as a demand might be kept up for it for the payment of duties required by law to be paid in gold; and the difficulties in obtaining even this amount would be greatly multiplied.

There are several methods by which this difficulty might be overcome. One of the most obvious would be to improve the standard of our silver coinage; that is, by putting more silver into each piece of silver coinage, so as to make its real comparative value about equal to the gold standard. But there are two difficulties in the way of this remedy: first, that it would involve the necessity of calling in our present silver coinage and recoining it: and, second, that when the standard of comparative value to gold should be thus fixed by act of Congress, it could not remain permanent for any defined period; for, by the laws of trade, of supply and demand, which are as independent of the laws of Congress as the laws which control the winds and the weather, this relative or comparative value of silver to gold will continue to fluctuate, regulated only by the market, and, as that may be greater or less than the comparative value as fixed by act of Congress, the one or the other will be hoarded or exported, as speculators and money-brokers may find it for their interest. It is this which opens the field for speculation by which fortunes are made, all or nearly all of which must come from the earnings of the honest laboring population of the country; and by this the equilibrium of the financial system and of the currency is constantly disturbed. These fluctuations are so frequent and of such perpetual occurrence that acts of Congress undertaking to adjust the relative value of the two metals can never afford anything like an effectual remedy. And any remedy by altering the standard of coinage, so as to adjust the nominal value of the silver coin to the real or market value, besides being necessarily imperfect, involves the necessity of calling in the coin already in circulation and recoining it, an operation which would be worse than the evil to be remedied.

It is true that Congress might at each session—but, considering the delays in practical legislation, not oftener—fix the standard of comparative value at the then market value; and this would be very clearly a legitimate mode of exercising the constitutional power of regulating the value of money, namely, by declaring the ratio of value which one metal should bear to the other. And when we come to the final analysis, this is about all of substance there is in the power. And no good reason occurs to me why a regulation declaring that silver coin shall be recognized as money and a legal tender at the comparative value it shall bear to gold in the market, in other words, at its real value, would not be a valid and proper exercise of the constitutional power. To hold otherwise would be to hold that Congress could only regulate the value of silver coin by placing it above or below its real value.

A law of this kind adopting the market value at all times of silver coins as compared to gold would be substantially just in principle to all parties and under all circumstances. It could not be unjust even to creditors who had contracted expressly for gold, because they would receive silver of equal value with the gold, and convertible into gold at their option, and without loss in the same market; but, if thought best, contracts expressly for gold, especially with public creditors, might be excepted. I am strongly inclined to believe, indeed I am entirely satisfied, that an act of Congress simply adopting the principle of market value of silver as compared to gold, and making the silver a legal tender according to that value, would be unobjectionable and in every way practicable in all great centers of business and in all the marts of trade. All business would readily adjust itself to this standard. But for the people generally, not accustomed to deal in money or to receive or pay it often or in large sums, and who, therefore, would not be well posted as to the market value or the data and modes of ascertaining or calculating the value upon that standard, some frequent and authoritative determination and declaration of such market value of the various silver coins should be made upon which they could rely, and upon which they could make their own calculations. This would involve the necessity of having such authoritative determination and declaration made and published at comparatively short periods to keep up with the fluctuations of the market value. And, as already shown, Congress could not thus determine and declare this by law oftener than once in a year, at the most. But great fluctuations might take place within the year. And to prevent great disturbances and speculations in the money market and great injustice and inequality, especially in the payment of large sums—if silver is to be made a legal tender for all amounts—a more frequent adjustment of the nominal to the real or market value would be required, a sliding scale graduated to much shorter periods than years.

Now, it is the principle I have been endeavoring to explain and the plan or method of carrying it into effect, together with the alterations of the original bill incident to this principle and plan, that constitute the distinctive features of the substitute. I offer this substitute and ask that it may be read as part of my argument, remarking here that the whole principle of the substitute is to be found in the third, fourth, and seventh sections, the others being added only to cover the whole field covered by the bill to which it is a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the silver coins of the United States now authorized by law, of the denominations of fifty cents and twenty-five cents, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $10 in any one payment, and the silver coins of the United States of a less denomination than the foregoing shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any sum not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

SEC. 2. That there shall be coined at the Mint of the United States a silver dollar of double the weight but of the same fineness and standard as the half dollar now authorized by law, which shall be a legal tender to any amount not exceeding $10 in any one payment.

SEC. 3. That the gold coinage of the United States shall remain, as at present, the standard and measure of values and a legal tender in payment of debts; but from and after the —— day of ——, 1876, the silver coins of the United States, of denominations of not less than twenty-five cents, and silver bullion, in bars duly stamped at the United States Mint, with a stamp showing their weight and fineness as hereinafter provided, together with the trade-dollar now authorized by law, shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, according to the market value of such silver coins and bullion as compared with such gold standard. And for the purpose of determining and declaring such market value the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Director of the Mint are hereby constituted a board to be known as the board of silver valuation of the United States, which shall have the power to determine and declare such relative value.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the said board, at a period not more than five nor less than two days before the beginning of each succeeding month, to determine and declare such market value and the market value of fine silver per ounce troy in United States gold coin, and thereupon forthwith to cause their determination to be transmitted to every assistant treasurer of the United States and to each collector of customs and of internal revenue, and to be published in at least one of the principal daily papers in the city of Washington for at least three successive days, and a like publication to be made in some daily newspaper, if any, and, if not, then in some triweekly or weekly newspaper, in the principal commercial city of each of the United States and in each of the organized Territories; and said board are authorized to use the telegraph for transmitting such determination, and required to do so when by the due course of mail more than two days would be required for such transmission. And the relative value at which such silver coin and bullion shall be received as such legal tender for the succeeding month, beginning with the first day thereof, shall be the value thus determined and declared. And the publications of such determination, as herein provided for, shall be prima facie evidence of such determination and of such value. And such board shall keep a record of all its transactions and determinations; and a certified copy of such record for any month showing such determination, and signed by any member of the board and attested by the seal of the Treasury Department, which said board are hereby required to give upon request, shall be conclusive evidence of such determination and of such value.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange any of the silver coins of the United States herein above mentioned at their nominal value for any equal amount of United States notes at their nominal value, which notes shall be retained and canceled, and not again replaced by other notes. And all United States notes redeemed under this act shall be held to be a part of the sinking fund provided for by existing law; the interest to be computed thereon as in the case of bonds redeemed under the act relating to the sinking fund.

SEC. 6. That any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at the mints, to be taken at its market value, as ascertained and publicly announced from time to time by the said board, to be paid for either in silver dollars or with gold coin or United States notes; or bullion for the coinage of said silver dollars may be procured in the mode provided for as to other silver coins by section 3,526 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Carson, and the United States assay office in New York, to issue to depositors of silver bullion certificates therefor, and which certificates shall be payable at the place of issue to the depositor or his order in fine silver bars, bearing the stamp of the mint or assay office issuing the same, the fineness of the bullion, and its weight in troy ounces; but no certificate shall be issued for less than —— ounces, and any difference or fractions shall be settled for in silver coin, at such rate as may be fixed from time to time by the said board as aforesaid.

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "A bill making silver coin a legal tender in the payment of debts."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. While satisfied of the correctness of the principle, and that by the proper details and machinery for carrying it into effect it may be made practically effective and beneficial, yet, not being a practical financier, I submit with some diffidence the plan, and with greater diffidence some details of the plan and machinery necessary to make the principle and plan effectual.

First, as to the composition of the board. More or other officers might be added, and the manner of rendering the determinations public might be changed in any way to make them effectual, and the provisions in reference to evidence might require further consideration.

Second. The substitute is drawn so as to make the silver coin and bullion legal tender in payment of all debts and sums without exception at the gold value. This might be changed if thought advisable, and I am inclined to think it ought to be, so as to except duties on imports and obligations required by law to be paid in gold coin.

Third. The present silver coinage which is all less than $1 might be left out of the bill entirely, and the limitation to $10 or any other small amount to which it should be received as legal tender made applicable to all the silver coins mentioned in the first and second sections, and provision made for issuing pieces of $1 and upward of a higher standard nearer to that of gold, and the principles of this bill made applicable only to these higher denominations. The bullion certificates might also be made a legal tender.

Any or all these alterations might be made without affecting the principle. But if the principle of market value is to be adopted at all, making silver of any kind of coin or silver bullion legal tenders without limitation, then the amount to which the present coinage should be made a legal tender to the nominal value should not, I think, be above $10 instead of $20, as in the bill to which this is offered as a substitute. But if this substitute is not adopted, then, I think, $20 is about the right sum, and I should support that bill.

If there be any serious question whether under this substitute the question of market value would be a judicial question—upon which I here express no opinion—which as between individuals could not be finally decided except judicially, still the principle of the substitute might be made practically just as effectual. It can be applied, and the board may decide as to all debts to or from the Government. National banks may be required to receive it at the market value determined by the board; and in all the Federal courts such determination might be made conclusive as between individuals, unless the party denying or wishing to deny its correctness should make and file with his pleading an affidavit, according to his belief, that such determination is not correct, in which event he should be allowed to contest it, but at his own risk as to costs. And as this question, in any case or in any court, could only arise upon a tender, and the party denying its sufficiency would always do so at the risk of costs, if found against him, the determination of such board would practically control everywhere as to the market value.

Now, I do not claim that the mode of carrying out the principle of market value is at all perfect under this substitute or that it might not be greatly improved. But after much reflection I am satisfied that silver cannot be made a legal tender generally without adopting its market value as compared to the gold standard, and that this can only be done so as to operate well everywhere by some mode of determining the market value at short periods. And I am equally well satisfied that, without availing ourselves of the aid of silver and making it a legal tender at the market value, it is idle to think of resuming specie payments by the time now fixed by law, unless we make provision speedily for redeeming or funding the greenbacks by the issue of 4 per cent. bonds at a long time and low rate of interest, payable either in gold or in silver at the market price as compared with the gold standard, which, in my opinion, would be taken just as readily as if payable in gold only. But I cannot resist the conviction that the best and speediest method of returning to specie payments is to fund and redeem the greenbacks in the mode proposed, at the option of the holder.

It is true that these constitute a non-interest-bearing portion of the public debt; and the desire to save so large an amount of interest seems to have been the great obstacle to the issue of bonds for redeeming them. But, in my opinion, if a proper law for this purpose were passed, it would not be sixty days, and I doubt if it would be thirty days, before these greenbacks would stand at par with gold, or practically so; and their greater convenience for circulation is such that, in my opinion, but a small portion comparatively would be soon presented for redemption, but they would continue to circulate as money; so that bonds would not be required to be issued for more than one-quarter of the amount, or say $120,000,000 to $150,000,000, the annual interest of which at 4 per cent. would be from $4,800,000 to $6,000,000: while the loss to the people of the country, from the uncertainty of their redemption as the law now stands and of the ability as well as the time for resumption, the want of confidence in capitalists, which prevents investment in any great enterprises, and other evils which are obvious and too numerous to mention growing out of the present state of things, is more than $100,000,000 per year. The moment greenbacks are brought up to par or substantially to par with gold, the great work of resumption is nearly completed and confidence will be restored and a comparatively small portion of gold and silver will then be needed; and I cannot avoid the conviction that this session of Congress ought not to be allowed to pass without the passage of such a measure.

And now I will only say in conclusion that I shall not be surprised or at all disappointed if my substitute should be rejected. It may be looked upon as wholly utopian, or Senators may properly think that so novel a principle as that of regulating the value of silver coin by the market value as compared to gold ought not to be adopted without further consideration than can be given it in this debate, or, perhaps, at this session. But I am satisfied the principle is correct, and that without its adoption we cannot return to specie payments without issuing bonds and funding or redeeming the greenbacks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the House joint resolution No. 109, with the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate, to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on recommitting the bill, (H. R. No. 3398,) with the amendments, to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegraphic communication.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it back with sundry amendments.

MRS. SUSAN E. RHEA.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up House bill 590, which was called up this morning. I move that it be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 590) for the relief of Mrs. Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. J. Burrows Gardiner, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Susan E. Rhea, who is the widow of J. Burrows Gardiner, a surgeon in the navy of Texas at the time of the annexation of that republic to the United States, the compensation which he would have received had he been living at the date of the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1857. The acceptance of these provisions is to be a full relinquishment of all claims on the part of Gardiner, or any other person or persons, for further compensation in this behalf from the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. K. EATON AND J. D. JENKINS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2829, reported by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] from the Committee on Claims, and read here the other day, when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] made an objection. That objection has been withdrawn.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2829) for the relief of Ariel K. Eaton and James D. Jenkins was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for paying to Ariel K. Eaton, of Osage, Iowa, late receiver of the land office at Decorah and Osage, Iowa, $3,600, on account of money paid out and expended by Eaton, as such receiver, for clerks in his office during the time he was the incumbent thereof, and for paying to James D. Jenkins, of Osage, Iowa, late register of the United States land office at Decorah and Osage, Iowa, $3,600, on account of money paid out and expended by Jenkins, as such register, for clerks in that office during the time he was the incumbent thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES ALLENDER.

Mr. WRIGHT. By reason of information received this morning, I am requested to move that the bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of James Allender, of Preston County, West Virginia, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH WILSON.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2836. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] reported this bill. It is for the relief of Joseph Wilson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2836) for the relief of Joseph Wilson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Joseph Wilson of $15,300, in full compensation for ninety mules captured from him by rebels at Beltsville, Maryland, in the year 1864, which mules were presented at the picket lines of the defenses around Washington, in part fulfillment of a contract to deliver in that city five hundred mules.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 783) providing for the extension of the time for completing the survey and location of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Railroads with an amendment to insert after the word "branches," in line 4, the words:

In accordance with the act approved April 12, 1872.

So as to make the bill read:

That the time for the completion of the survey and location of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and branches, in accordance with the act approved April 12, 1872, be, and the same is hereby, extended three years from the 14th day of April, 1875.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HAMLIN, Mr. OGLESBY, and Mr. WINDOM submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, reported amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. LLOYD.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 784.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 784) for the relief of Enoch Totten, administrator of the estate of William A. Lloyd, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Enoch Totten, administrator of the estate of William A. Lloyd, deceased, $9,753.32, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid, in full for the personal services of Lloyd, rendered in pursuance of a contract made with Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and extending from July 11, 1861, to June 5, 1865.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out $9,753.32 and inserting $6,713.33.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know whether there is a report in that case. I should like to know where the claim came from.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can explain without taking up time in reading the report.

Mr. Totten is the administrator of the estate of William A. Lloyd, deceased. Mr. Lloyd was employed by Mr. Lincoln in the early days of the war to go into the rebel lines and act as a detective or scout under a contract for $200 per month—a written contract. He did go into the lines and continued this service until the war closed. His services were recognized repeatedly by the administration. He returned after Mr. Lincoln's death; and the Department declined to take any action on the matter in any way whatever. He brought his suit in the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims determined that the President had no power to make any such contract. It went to the Supreme Court of the United States and they decided that the President had full power to make such contract, but that it was contrary to public policy that a party should be allowed to bring suit upon a contract that was thus secret in its character and nature; and they therefore, without determining against the justice of the claim in any way, decided that he had no right to bring such suit, by reason of the secret character of the contract.

He was paid for his expenses. The Department recognized his services to that extent that they paid for his expenses, but did not pay him under the contract. We allow him according to the terms of his contract up to the time that he returned into our lines, but not for any time after that, and deduct from the amount that he was entitled to by his contract all the money paid him for his expenses. That is the nature of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. To my mind all such claims are based upon a false foundation. I have always had the impression that a man who will sell himself to go within the lines of an enemy, and be there in a false character, is unworthy of trust. My experience has proved to me that people of that sort cheat both sides. I dare say if Mr. Lincoln employed this man, as the Senator says he did, Mr. Lincoln paid him the compensation which he promised him. I move that the bill be postponed for the present. I am against all this sort of thing.

I may say here that at the beginning of the administration of Mr. Lincoln, when there was talk about employing spies and detectives, I opposed it, and all the time I was connected with the administration I do not think any person of that character was employed. I think the principle is wrong; I believe that any man who suffers himself to be put in such a position as that is unworthy of compensation or trust.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot imagine how that can be. The President of the United States desired the services of this man and employed him and sent him, and he did go in pursuance of that employment and did a work that was regarded as very important to the Government. He performed most valuable services, as the testimony tends to show, and they were recognized by the President and by all the Departments of the Government. He returned and was paid for his expenses, but was not paid under his contract. It is simply intended by this bill to pay him according to his contract for the time he was engaged, deducting the expenses that were paid him. I trust there will be no hesitation in passing this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I fear this vote will disclose the want of a quorum, and I do not intend to do anything of that kind. I regret very much that this motion should be made; but I shall not insist on the consideration of the bill at present, though I feel that it is eminently a proper bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa consents to the postponement of this bill. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. Just let the bill be laid aside by common consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside informally by common consent.

SETTLERS UPON LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 547.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 547) for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in the State of Minnesota was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 4 of section 1, after the word "have," to insert "prior to the 1st day of May, 1876;" in line 6, before the word "made," to strike out "or" and insert "and;" and after the word "made" to strike out the words "or acquired;" so as to make the section read:

That all persons, citizens of the United States, or who have declared their intentions to become such, and who have, prior to the 1st day of May, 1876, settled upon and made valuable improvements upon any of the lands included in the granted or indemnity limits of any of the extensions or branches of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad within the State of Minnesota to which legal title has not been perfected, shall be allowed to enter such lands at the United States land office of the district wherein such lands may be situated in all respects the same as though no grant of said land had ever been made by the United States.

Mr. BOGY. I do not object to the bill; but if these lands have been granted heretofore to any of these railroad companies can we divest them of that right by any legislation here?

Mr. WINDOM. I will say to the Senator that the railroad company has forfeited its right to the lands. It has failed twice.

Mr. BOGY. It may be that the companies have not built their road within the time prescribed by law; but does that forfeiture enable us in law to convey those lands to anybody else?

Mr. WINDOM. We have twice extended the grant and the company has twice forfeited it, so that it has no claim on these forfeited lands.

Mr. BOGY. Unless the forfeiture has been completed either by the action of a court or of the legislative department.

Mr. WINDOM. The Supreme Court has decided that the forfeiture must be declared either by the courts or by Congress. We simply declare it so far as these actual settlers are concerned and not otherwise, simply giving men that are on the lands and have improved them the right of pre-emption.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, to insert before the word "satisfactory" the word "making;" and after "proof" to insert "of settlement and improvement as aforesaid;" and in line 5, after the word "lands," to strike out "with cash or otherwise;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the person or persons claiming the benefits of this act shall, upon making satisfactory proof of settlement and improvement as aforesaid to the register and receiver of the land office where such lands are situated, be allowed to enter of such lands, at $1.25 per acre, or under the homestead or pre-emption laws, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres each, including his, her, or their improvements: Provided, That such person or persons shall make application therefor within six months from the passage hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS WITHIN NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LIMITS.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of another bill for the relief of settlers. I make the request now because I am compelled to be absent on the appropriation bills nearly all the time. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2473.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2473) to authorize claimants upon even-numbered sections of land within the twenty-mile limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad to make proof and payment for their claims at the ordinary minimum rate of $1.25 per acre was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands proposed to amend the bill by striking out in lines 4, 5, and 6 the words:

According to its preliminary location, but not within the twenty-mile limit as definitely located.

So as to make the bill read:

That claimants upon even-numbered sections within the twenty-mile limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad shall be entitled to make proof and payment upon their claims at the ordinary minimum rate of $1.25 per acre where settlement was made in good faith prior to the definite location of said railroad, upon making proper proof of settlement, cultivation, and occupation, as required by existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. If any gentleman desires, I will make a brief explanation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be explained.

Mr. WINDOM. Originally the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad in the State of Minnesota was located some forty miles from where it now is. During the time that it was located at this point settlers went upon the lands some forty miles south of it, not then included within the limits, and made their improvements. Afterward the line was shifted to them, and this bill provides that those men who settled upon the lands and made their improvements prior to the location of the road shall be permitted to take them at a dollar and a quarter an acre. That is all there is of it.

Mr. DAWES. How about the railroad? They have a limit of two dollars and a half and they sell their lands at two dollars and a half, and settlers can go beside them at a dollar and a quarter under this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. The railroad company may sell its lands for what it pleases. This bill only applies to settlers who settled on the lands before the line was located.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did they locate? In a way the law entitled them to locate?

Mr. WINDOM. They settled on the lands and made improvements.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did they settle? As pre-emptors?

Mr. WINDOM. As pre-emptors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If they made their pre-emption entries before the line of the road was located——

Mr. WINDOM. They may not have made the entries; they may have been behind with their filing; but they were living on the lands, and the question is whether, the road having shifted, they should have the price of their lands increased? Having settled on lands supposed to be open to pre-emption at the time at the regular price, why should that price be raised on them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I concede the force of what the Senator from Minnesota says; but the difficulty into which we are to be led is this: The railroad company will come back and say to us, "Here you gave us a definite charter with definite rights, and one of those rights was that within twenty miles of the line that should be located the United States would not sell any lands at less than two dollars and a half an acre as the minimum; now you have gone and changed your law, and allowed settlers to locate and settle at a dollar and a quarter, and have thereby underbid us and put our lands out of the market in respect of our capacity to dispose of them;" and thereupon they will ask us to make it good.

Mr. WINDOM. They would hardly do that; but I will ask the Senator whether that is not substantially answered by the fact that these men were upon the lands, and had made their claims before the road was located? Certainly the railroad could have no complaint to make if it located its line on lands already occupied by settlers. This bill does not apply generally, but only to the few settlers who had gone and made their claims before the location of the railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be perfectly true if these people had made their entries at a dollar and a quarter according to law; but the rights of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company were determined according to the law as it stood when they made the definite location—I believe that is the term—of the line of their road. As the law then stood, people who were on these public lands, and who had not conformed to the law, but were mere squatters, had not any rights according to the decisions of the courts or according to justice and law. That is to say, if they claim anything under the Government they must conform to the laws of the Government in making the claim. That we all agree to. That being the case, this company will turn around upon us and say, "You have in violation of our charter proceeded to sell your lands and allowed them to be entered at a less price than you had fixed in the charter as the minimum which covers these very laws, and therefore you must make good to us the loss we have sustained because you have underbid us." It may be perfectly fair and right toward the settlers; it may be morally just toward the company; but, knowing from some observation the notions of railroad companies in general, I venture to prophesy that if this bill passes we shall have a claim of that character. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WINDOM. I think such a technical claim as that made by a railroad company would not receive much consideration. I will agree to pay myself all the claim they make on that consideration. The bill is to remove only what is really a hardship to the settlers.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REDEMPTION OF UNUSED STAMPS.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to take up House bill No. 1100, which I think will take but a moment. It provides for the return to the Treasury of unused stamps. It was reported by my colleague from the Committee on Finance some time ago as the unanimous report of that committee, and is accompanied by a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who will explain it in a moment if any Senator thinks it needs explanation.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals the fourteenth section of the act of February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes," and allows all unused stamps to be redeemed when properly presented, as was done prior to the passage of the aforesaid act. But hereafter no allowance is to be made for documentary stamps, except those of the denomination of two cents, which, when presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are not found to be in the same condition as when issued by the Internal-Revenue Department, or, if so required by the Commissioner, when the person presenting the same cannot satisfactorily trace the history thereof from their issue to their presentation.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREADWELL S. AYRES.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 810.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 810) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $2,500 in full compensation for Ayres's building in Memphis occupied by the United States military authorities in that city, under contract made with competent military authorities during the late war to pay rent for the occupation of such building, upon his executing a bond of indemnity to the United States, with sureties satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury, against the claim of any other parties for compensation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report in that case be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There seems to be no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a report made at the last session, which was agreed to by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has been sent for.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

Mr. WRIGHT. While that report is being found, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 830.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out the words:

And interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from the 22d day of July, in the year 1865, to the date of payment under this act.

And also by striking out the words "day aforesaid" and inserting "22d day of July, in the year 1865;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Joseph W. Parish, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $4,220, in full for that amount paid over by him in cash to the Commissary Department of the Army, on the 22d day of July, in the year 1865.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is a report; but I can make a statement of the case in very few words. Mr. Parish had a large contract for furnishing ice to the medical department at New Orleans. He was in Saint Louis. Another party had a contract for furnishing pork at Louisville. The quartermaster at Louisville, learning that Mr. Parish was in Saint Louis, sent an order there for his arrest, claiming that he was in some manner connected with the contract in Louisville. He being engaged in performing his contract for delivering ice, it being a matter of vital importance to him that he should give every hour's attention, and one day's delay being very prejudicial to him, the quartermaster making a claim of $4,800, he paid the money under protest. It was subsequently ascertained that he had nothing whatever to do with the Louisville contract; that he was not in any manner a party to it. The object of this bill is to repay him the money thus paid by him, and exacted from him because of his connection with this ice contract. At that time to leave Saint Louis and go to Louisville for the purpose of defense would have been prejudicial to him to a very large amount. That is the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREADWELL S. AYRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill called up by the Senator from Oregon will now be considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 810) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayers.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. As the report has not been found, I ask that the Senate go into executive session for a few moments to take up a matter of some immediate importance. It will not require more than ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will not the Senator from Pennsylvania allow the bill that is up to be disposed of?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. We have not got the report.

Mr. MITCHELL. The report is here.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. J. T. HARRIS, from the Committee on War Claims, in the House of Representatives, on the 2d of May, 1874:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2891) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee, having considered the same, report:

That the said Ayres was, in January, 1864, and for some time previous, the owner of a certain building or block of buildings in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, on Second street, of said city, seventy-four feet front, one hundred and forty-eight feet deep, four stories high, with an iron front, valued at about $100,000, built in the year 1860, and known as Ayres's building; that on or about the 6th of January, 1863, Captain A. R. Eddy, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, who was then on duty at Memphis, and properly charged with the duty of furnishing quarters and offices for the various Army officers on duty at that point, by his agent and clerk in charge of the rental department of the quartermaster's department at Memphis, contracted with the said Ayres for the rental of such rooms in the said Ayres's building as might be required for the use of the pay and other departments of the United States Army at Memphis, for such length of time as might be desired, agreeing to pay therefor such rent as might be reasonable and just.

It appears that nineteen rooms of said building were used by the pay department and for courts-martial, and claim is made for compensation, as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO T. S. AYRES,	DR.
To rent of rooms in Ayres's building, Memphis, for use of United States Pay Department and courts-martial from 6th January, 1863, to 14th February, 1865:
Rooms Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, offices, second story, twenty-five months, at $30 per month each	$4,500 00
Rooms Nos. 7 and 8, offices, second story, from 15th January, 1863, to 15th February, 1864, thirteen months, at $30 per month each	780 00
Rooms Nos. 9 and 10, second story, offices, from January 6, 1863, to April 10, 1863, three months, at $30 per month each	180 00
Rooms Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, third story, from January, 1863, to 14th February, 1865, twenty-five months, at $15 per month each	1,500 00
Rooms Nos. 17, 18, 19, third story, from January 6, 1863, to 15th February, 1864, thirteen months, at $15 per month each	385 00
Rooms Nos. 11, 12, nine months, at $15 per month	270 00

T. S. AYRES.

Your committee find that this claim was presented to the Quartermaster-General, who reported against it solely on the ground that "Memphis was a hostile city captured from the enemy, and it and everything in it became prize of war," without the slightest regard to the fact that Memphis was within the lines of the Federal forces when the property of Mr. Ayres was taken under a contract. It was then presented to the Court of Claims, which decided (vol. 3, page 1)—

First. That the ownership of the property was in the claimant, and that the rent claimed for the time of its occupancy was just and reasonable;

Second. That the loyalty of the claimant was fully established;

Third. That the taking was an appropriation of property by the Army; and Fourth. That the court was excluded from adjudicating upon it by the express terms of the act of July 4, 1864.

The case was then withdrawn from the Court of Claims and presented to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department, to wit, the Third Auditor, who referred it to the Quartermaster-General for certification of the facts, as is the practice in such cases. The report of the Quartermaster-General was made July 20, 1870, who, though he did not deny the facts as set forth by the claimant, reported adversely to the allowance of the claim on the ground that "rent is not a quartermaster's store."

Your committee are clearly of opinion that there was an implied contract between Captain Eddy and the claimant for the payment of rent for the occupation of the building, and that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States vs. Anderson, 9 Wallace, page 56, covers this case, as Memphis was within the lines of the Federal forces when this property was taken. As to the question of contract the following testimony is given, taken before the Court of Claims:

"My name is Edward R Hill. I am, by occupation, book-keeper. I am forty-five years of age. I am a resident of Memphis and have been for the past seven years. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the claim which is the subject of inquiry.

"I know the claimant in the above-entitled cause, and I am in no degree related to him. I state further that on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1863, and prior to that date, I was engaged and employed in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, stationed at Memphis, Tennessee, and especially in what was called the rental department, under the direction and control of Captain A. R. Eddy, acting as United States quartermaster, &c.; that, on the 5th or 6th day of January, 1863, certain officers of the Army of the United States Pay Department, Majors Judd, Brown, Farrish, Gould, Osgood, and others, with clerks and guards, arrived in Memphis, and applied to Captain A. R. Eddy, acting quartermaster, for rooms or offices in which they could proceed to pay off the troops of the United States Army in and about Memphis, &c., when said Captain A. R. Eddy directed me to find suitable rooms for said offices. I, under the direction and authority of Captain A. R. Eddy, acting quartermaster, applied to T. S. Ayres, owner of the Ayres building, on Second street, Memphis, for the offices in his said building for the officers of the Pay Department, when said T. S. Ayres fully and freely agreed that the rooms or offices in said building should be so used and occupied by the officers of the United States Army, and on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1863, the said officers were placed in possession of the said offices by me and said T. S. Ayres, who furnished the keys of the several rooms and had them placed in order.

"I further state that said T. S. Ayres has been a citizen of Memphis, Tennessee, for the last twenty years; never engaged in rebellion, and has always been loyal to the Government of the United States; was then, and always has been, at his home in Memphis; never went beyond the lines of the military occupation of the United States Army, or abandoned his property, but was then in actual possession of the same as owner.

"And I stated to said Ayres, when I applied for said offices, that he would be paid rent for the same, and under my said promise and assurance as to rent he consented to the use thereof, and gave me possession of the same; and said officers were placed in possession on the 6th day of January, 1863; and said offices were used and occupied by officers of Pay Department and courts-martial from that time until the 14th of February, 1865.

"I further state that on the 12th day of January, 1863, after said offices were occupied by the Pay Department, and while they were in possession, certain officers of the Medical Department, surgeons of the United States Army, were about to select the said Ayres building for a hospital, when Major-General U. S. Grant, then in command at Memphis, at the instance and on application of the officers of the Pay Department, made an order directing Major E. D Judd, senior paymaster, to occupy the offices or rooms in Ayres building for Pay Department, &c. This order was made to prevent the use of same as a hospital, and to continue the officers of the Pay Department in possession.

"Said property, Ayres building, was never abandoned by the owner, or confiscated, or taken up by the rental department.

"I can state further that it was fully understood between Mr. Ayres and myself that he was to receive rent for his rooms or offices. It was merely accommodation on the part of Mr. Ayres in giving up the rooms."

Your committee are clearly of opinion that the claimant is legally and equitably entitled to compensation for the property so taken and used, and accordingly report the accompanying bill, paying for rooms 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, at the rate of $20 per month, and for rooms 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 at the rate of $15 per month, in all amounting to the sum of $5,995, and recommend its passage.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill where that evidence was taken, whether before a court or ex parte?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] who reported the bill, is not present. I reported it at the last session of Congress.

Mr. KEY. The report states that the testimony was taken before the Court of Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL. We do not allow as much as was originally proposed.

Mr. LOGAN. How much is allowed?

Mr. MITCHELL. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. Was the case ever before the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; and they rejected it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Rejected it for want of proof of loyalty.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Illinois cannot object, I suppose, to the consideration of the bill. The bill is up; has been taken up by a vote. I will say, however, that if there is objection, and it is likely to lead to discussion, I have no disposition, in the absence of the Senator from New Hampshire, to press the bill now, and will consent that it shall go over.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not make any objection, I will say to the Senator, for the purpose of making opposition to the bill, but for the purpose of having an opportunity of ascertaining something about it. I know Captain Eddy very well, and it strikes me as very strange that he has not appeared in this case. I know about the time mentioned there and about that community. I happened to be there about that time myself. If a proper rental was agreed to be paid, I have no objection to it; but I should like to know something about it. I do not know that I shall make any opposition to it, but I should like to have an opportunity of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also am acquainted with Captain Eddy and know him very well. I desire to state before the bill goes over that the bill has been thoroughly considered by the Committee on Claims, both at the last session of Congress and at the present session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why was not Eddy examined as a witness?

Mr. MITCHELL. From the simple fact that it was not necessary, because the evidence is conclusive that this arrangement was made between Ayres and officers of the Government. I am not certain but that Eddy's testimony is on file.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be, but it has not been read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I am sure he will be satisfied, if he examines the testimony in the case, that there was a contract between the Government, through its officers, and Mr. Ayres for the use of these buildings, with the exception of the price; there was no contract as to the price.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has this man ever been before the southern claims commission?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not remember as to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be worth knowing.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I say, if it leads to discussion the matter can go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be postponed for the present, if there be no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up a bill that I know will take but a moment, and will certainly lead to no discussion. It is House bill No. 1692. I move to take it up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1692) to amend an act approved May 8, 1874, in regard to leave of absence of Army officers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act approved May 8, 1874, in regard to leave of absence of Army officers, so that all officers on duty shall be allowed sixty days' leave of absence without deduction of pay or allowance, if the same be taken once in two years; and that the leave of absence may be extended to three months if taken once only in three years, or four months if taken only once in four years.

The Committee on Military Affairs proposed to amend the bill in line 6, after the word "allowed," by inserting "in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LITTLE ROCK.

Mr. DORSEY. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 297. It is simply to raise the limitation on the cost of the post-office and court-house at Little Rock, Arkansas. It will take but a moment, I am sure.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 297) appropriating money to erect a building at Little Rock, Arkansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the act of Congress approved June 7, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal-revenue, and other civil offices in the city of Little Rock, Arkansas," be, and hereby is, amended by fixing the limit of expenditure authorized for the site and full completion of said building at $250,000.

Mr. DORSEY. The bill, as amended, makes no appropriation whatever. It simply limits the amount that may be expended when the appropriation shall be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say that the bill was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds after the receipt from the Secretary of the Treasury of information that the original limitation was too small for a building at that place, and also a communication from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. This bill, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, appropriates no money, but merely changes the limitation to a larger sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the old limitation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. One hundred thousand dollars. This is $250,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very moderate! It more than doubles it!

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suggest that the title ought to be changed.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that the title be made to conform with the text of the bill, so as to read: "A bill fixing the limit of expenditure for the erection of a public building at Little Rock, Arkansas."

The amendment was agreed to.

COUNTERFEITING OF COIN.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 739) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to counterfeiting. I make this motion because through an accident the law about counterfeiting the coin and currency of the United States has got into rather a dilapidated condition, and it is very important to pass the bill. I have no doubt it will occasion no debate and can pass in a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 739) to amend section 5457 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to counterfeiting coin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 5457 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Every person who falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits, or causes or procures to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aids or assists in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any coin or bars in resemblance or similitude of the gold or silver coins or bars which have been, or hereafter may be, coined or stamped at the mints and assay offices of the United States, or in resemblance or similitude of any foreign gold or silver coin which by law is, or hereafter may be, current in the United States or are in actual use and circulation as money within the United States, or who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or attempts to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or bring into the United States from any foreign place, knowing the same to be false, forged, or counterfeit, with intent to defraud any body, politic or corporate, or any other person or persons whatsoever, or has in his possession any such false, forged, or counterfeited coin or bars, knowing the same to be false, forged, or counterfeited, with intent to defraud any body, politic or corporate, or any other person or persons whatsoever, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than ten years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to explain in a single word that by an accident, as the law now stands, we have got it into such a shape that a district attorney of the United States who seizes counterfeit money is liable to indictment under the statutes of the United States, having it in his possession a single moment, although he seizes it for the purpose of prosecuting the offender; and this is to correct that misfortune.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 5457 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to counterfeiting."

W. H. WOODWARD.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to take up Senate bill 845. The bill is reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MAXEY. This bill will take but a moment. It is regularly reported favorably.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am very sorry to interfere with any of the Senators, but there is important business which I want to lay before the Senate in executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania takes precedence, being a privileged motion.

Mr. OGLESBY. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill was regularly submitted to the Committee on Claims and reported favorably.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 845) for the relief of W. H. Woodward, of Indianola, Texas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Woodward, without interest, of $588, the amount due him on account of property rented from him by the United States military authorities.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can state the substance of the report in a moment to the Senator from Vermont, or the report itself can be read very soon. The claim is simply for the rent of property in 1865 and 1866, after the close of the war, under a contract, for which a regular voucher was given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did he not get his pay at the Department in the ordinary way?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not good on account of the law passed in 1867 prohibiting any payment to persons in the insurrectionary States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, on the 31st of May:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of W. H. Woodward, with the accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Senate bill No. 845, for the relief of W. H. Woodward, of Indianola, Texas, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the said Woodward, without interest, $588, on account of property rented from him by the United States military authorities.

Your committee find that Lieutenant J. B. Topping acting assistant quartermaster, United States Army, rented from W. H. Woodward two buildings in Indianola, Texas, as quartermaster's store-houses, one of the said buildings at the rate of $30 per month from August 1, 1865, until September 18, 1865, inclusive, and the other at the rate of $60 per month from July 26, 1865, until October 31, 1865, inclusive, and that he gave duplicate vouchers to the said Woodward, properly approved, for the said rent, as follows:

Duplicate vouchers for rent from August 1, 1865, to August 31, 1865	$30
Duplicate vouchers for rent from September 1, 1865, to September 18, 1865	18
Duplicate vouchers for rent from July 26, 1865, to August 31, 1865	70
Duplicate vouchers for rent from September 1, 1865, to October 31, 1865	120

the said vouchers amounting to $238.50, and being on file in the Office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, certified copies of which have been furnished by the Auditor, and accompany this report.

Your committee further find that Captain and Brevet Major E. J. Smith, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, rented from the said Woodward, under contract, at the same place, one building for the storage of ordnance stores, at the rate of $50 per month, from September 1, 1865, until March 31, 1866, at which time the said building was discharged, and that he gave to the said Woodward a certificate for the said rent, a copy of which accompanies this report.

Your committee further find that application for payment of the said rents was made as early as September 27, 1866, but was denied, for the reason that rent arising in the State of Texas previous to the proclamation of the President of August 25, 1866, could not be favorably considered, and that for this reason, namely, that the rent accrued prior to August 20, 1866, payment thereof has since been refused.

Your committee addressed the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor, and received the following:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 6, 1876.

Respectfully returned to Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, Washington, District of Columbia. "Officers' reports of persons and articles" cover only persons employed and property hired or rented by the Quartermaster's Department. It appears from Major E. J. Smith's (forms) report of persons, &c., on file in this Office, that the property mentioned in the inclosed certificate was rented by him from W. H. Woodward; was occupied for the storage of ordnance stores from September 1, 1865, to March 31, 1866, on which day it was discharged; rate of rent, $50 per month. His report does not show any payment therefor, but his money accounts, on file at the Treasury, might possibly throw additional light on the subject.

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
May 12, 1876.

The possession by claimant of the duplicate vouchers, which he presented with his claim, raises a strong presumption that the amounts represented by them have not been paid, for if any quartermaster had made payment he would have taken up the vouchers, with Mr. Woodward's receipt thereon, and filed them in his quartermaster accounts as his vouchers for the disbursement. I cannot state absolutely that payment has not been made, for cases have been known when, by mistake or fraud on the part of the quartermaster, a claimant has obtained two sets of vouchers and has procured payment on each. Captain E. J. Smith, assistant quartermaster, was the officer who should have made the payments, if any, but his accounts show no credits for such payments.

HORACE AUSTIN, Auditor.

Your committee, believing that there is no legal or equitable objection to the payment of the claim, and that the same is a just and honest obligation of the Government, recommend the passage of the bill, herewith returned. There was a contract; the rent was fixed by this contract; under the contract the property was occupied, and the claimant is entitled to the rent agreed upon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3670, reported last Monday from the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CAMERON. Before any other bill is taken up, I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope I shall be allowed to get this bill passed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I commenced an hour and a half ago and I am no nearer my object yet. I promise that the business will not occupy ten minutes, and we shall return immediately to open business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the motion will not prevail at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This bill will take but a single moment; it is a local matter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to be allowed to make a single remark, and that is that I have no objection if there is a desire to go into executive session at this moment, provided there can be an understanding that after that session we shall come back into legislative session, for I desire to present a resolution that I think the Senate will entertain and which ought to be considered, if at all, at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 8, 10, 11, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, and 14.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the words "two million" and insert in lieu thereof "one million seven hundred and fifty thousand," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of said amendment the words "one million" and insert in lieu thereof "nine hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred," and the Senate agree to the same.

A. A. SARGENT,
A. H. CRAGIN,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAS. H BLOUNT,
FRANK JONES,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SARGENT. Unless some Senator desires a detailed explanation——

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator indicate what the amendments are?

Mr. SARGENT. The important disagreements between the House and Senate were upon the first item, which was for the pay of the Navy, upon the appropriations for the Bureaus of Construction and Steam Engineering. There were some other amendments, one of a legislative character. The Senate adopted a legislative provision in regard to the employment of force at the navy-yards. The House accept the legislative provision in the Senate amendments in reference to that matter.

With regard to the pay of the Navy, it was urged by the House conferees that on consultation with the officers of the Navy Department it was believed that by a very rigid enforcement of a somewhat disused power on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to furlough officers instead of having them under the heads of "other duty" or "waiting orders" a very considerable reduction could be made, they believing as much reduction as was made in the House bill. The Senate conferees, on consideration, determined that they would try the effect of this reform, if it may be so called, in the administration of naval affairs, and give the Secretary of the Navy the disagreeable duty of putting officers upon furlough where they could be spared from the actual needs of the service; at the same time saying that if it should be found by experiment that it was impossible to get though the fiscal year, we at another session of Congress would perhaps make it right.

Upon the item of construction the House met us half way, we agreeing to an amount of $250,000 over the House bill. Upon the question of engineering they also met us half way, agreeing to an addition of between $50,000 and $60,000. Some items the Senate recede from, as for instance "for the civil service at all the navy-yards," which was fixed at $85,000 in the House bill and raised by the Senate to $100,000, we receded and reduced it to $85,000. We also receded from the amendment increasing the appropriation for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting and the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

With reference to the item closing for the present year the hospitals at Annapolis and Washington, an agreement was arrived at by striking out the words closing them without making any addition to the appropriation, so that if they are kept open it will not be at any greater cost, and the Department will be put to its discretion whether they shall be opened or closed.

These are the features of the bill. It is a very fair concession on both sides, and I should like to say, if it would be possible for me to say so, that the conferees on the part of the House evinced a very reasonable and kind disposition, and I am very well satisfied indeed with the result of the conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What became of the proposition respecting the employment of force in the navy-yards?

Mr. SARGENT. The amendment drawn by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and adopted by the Senate is accepted by the conferees, and stands in the bill in lieu of the House provision.

The report was concurred in.

BRIDGE AT NEBRASKA CITY.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3670) authorizing the Nebraska City Bridge Company to construct a ponton-railway bridge across the Missouri River at Nebraska City, in Otoe County, Nebraska.

Mr. BOGY. I ask the Secretary to read again the first and second sections of the bill.

The sections were read.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear read the provision in reference to altering or amending the law.

The Chief Clerk read section 3.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska to put in the word "repeal;" so as to read:

Alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to that that I know of, except that it involves returning the bill to the House.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the effect of the words in the bill is substantially that, but it would be better to say it in so many words.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a House bill, and if we amend it, it will have to be returned to the House.

Mr. DAWES. I do not care to have it go back to the House.

Mr. PADDOCK. It does not seem to be essential to have any such clause in.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire from what committee this bill was reported?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not make any objection to that, although if we could ascertain the number of committees who have charge of bills for bridging streams I think it would be a useful fact to chronicle in the history of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to state that I introduced a similar bill some time since, which was referred, as I supposed, to the Committee on Commerce, but afterward I learned that that bill had gone to the Committee on Railroads; and so when this bill came from the House, which was almost the same as the one I had introduced before, I agreed with my colleague that this bill also could go to the Committee on Railroads; and so it took that direction.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not mean that the other bill referred to went to the Committee on Railroads?

Mr. PADDOCK. I was so informed by my colleague.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is similar to one or two bills that have passed the Senate at this session.

Mr. BOGY. A bill passed a short time ago authorizing the building of a ponton-bridge at La Crosse, on the Mississippi River, which is precisely the same. My constituents have large interests in the navigation of the Mississippi River, and I took great pains to examine that bill, and I think it is well guarded in every way.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the bill. I make no objection. I was simply moved by curiosity to know from what committee it came.

Mr. BOGY. I know that I have no immediate interest in the bill; but I think it is very guarded and there can be no sort of objection to it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEMPORARY CONTINUANCE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the message of the President, communicating the draught of a joint resolution for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back, with some amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) to provide for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service was read for information, as follows:

Whereas the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service in its various branches, comprising among others the expenses which especially pertain to the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the Government, to the consular and diplomatic service, to the postal service, to the support of the Army and to the maintenance of the Navy, are generally met by annual appropriations which expire at the end of the current fiscal year; and whereas no public funds will be available to defray these expenses as the same shall accrue after that period unless appropriations shall have been previously made therefor by law; and whereas to avoid the great embarrassment to the public service that might otherwise ensue it is expedient to make provision for defraying temporarily such of these expenses as would be unprovided for in case some one of the usual annual appropriation bills designed to provide therefor should fail to be matured by the end of the fiscal year now current: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case any of the following appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, shall not have passed by the commencement of such year, so that the funds to be appropriated thereby may then be available for expenditure, that is to say, the bill providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; the bill providing for the consular and diplomatic expenses; the bill providing for the service of the Post-Office Department; the bill providing for the support of the Army; and the bill providing for the naval service, the appropriation act for the current fiscal year corresponding in its general description and object to such appropriation bill shall extend to the fiscal year next ensuing until such appropriation bill is enacted and takes effect, to the end that the provisions of such appropriation act which apply to the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service for the current fiscal year shall in like manner as if enacted for the ensuing fiscal year be applicable to similar expenses which may accrue during the period intervening between the end of the current fiscal year and the time when such appropriation bill for the next ensuing fiscal year shall be enacted and take effect, but in no case beyond the period of thirty days.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not that go over as a matter of course, or is there a necessity for immediate action?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I supposed it would be acted on by general consent to-day, because we want to get it to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable. I presume the Senator is advised as to the original proposition, but the substance of the proposition as it now stands is this: Apprehensive, in the present condition of affairs, that the appropriation bills necessary to carry on the several branches of the public service may not be completed by the 1st day of July, when, by the ordinary regulations of law, all the existing appropriations would cease, so that the public service would be at a standstill, this proposition is to re-enact all those appropriation bills for a period not exceeding thirty days. That is the limitation, and that is understood to be the effect of this proposition. I hardly think there is any danger in it; and, as a matter of prudence, it seems to me it is very desirable that the Senate should act upon it, and, if so, the sooner it goes to the House of Representatives, I think, the better. Certainly, if we intend to act, we ought to send it there in sufficient time to enable them to consider it before the close of the fiscal year. Very possibly, I hope, perhaps there is the highest probability that there may be no occasion for it; but, in the present condition of affairs, it seems to me that we ought to do this and do it promptly. For instance, if by any possibility we should fail to agree on the post-office appropriation bill, so that there must be an application of the law to the postal service extending to every hamlet in the land, the effect would be to stop that service. That is to say, if the Post-Office Department regard the obligations of the law, they have no money to spend.

The joint resolution was, by unanimous consent, read three times, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask to be excused from serving as one of the managers on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill. I am engaged in preparing a report from the Judiciary Committee in a very important matter that will take all to-day and to-morrow, and without neglecting that I could not serve. I ask to be excused.

Mr. THURMAN was excused; and, the President pro tempore being authorized to fill the vacancy, Mr. GORDON was appointed.

TRADE-MARK GOODS.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the trade-mark bill, so called.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend section 1, line 12, by striking out, after the words "imprisoned for," the words "not less than six months and;" so as to make the section read:

That every person who shall have in his possession, or deal in, or sell, or keep or offer for sale, or cause or procure the sale of, any goods of substantially the same descriptive properties as those referred to in the registration of any trade-mark, pursuant to the statutes of the United States, to which, or to the package in which the same are put up, is fraudulently affixed said trade-mark, or any colorable imitation thereof, calculated to deceive the public, knowing the same to be counterfeit or not the genuine goods referred to in said registration, shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned for not more than two years, and shall also be liable to the aggrieved owner of said trade-mark in the penal sum of $1,000, to be recovered in a civil action.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee proposed to amend the seventh section so as to make it read:

SEC. 7. That any person who shall, with intent to injure or defraud or to aid in defrauding or injuring the owner of any trade-mark, or any other person lawfully entitled to use or protect the same, buy, sell, offer for sale, deal in, or have in his possession any used or empty box, envelope, wrapper, case, bottle, or other package, to which is affixed, so that the same may be obliterated without substantial injury to such box or other thing aforesaid, any trade-mark, registered pursuant to the statutes of the United States, not so defaced, erased, obliterated and destroyed as to prevent its fraudulent use, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished as prescribed in the first section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in section 10, line 4, after the words "imprisoned for," to strike out "not less than three months and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "hereof," in the second and third sections, seems to be in conflict with other words.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the word "hereof" be stricken out in both sections and the words "of this act" inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from New York. If I understand the bill, I am very heartily in support of it. The first section provides a penalty for the sale of "any goods of substantially the same descriptive properties as those referred to in the registration of any trade-mark," but they must have that trade-mark upon them, as I understand. I ask whether it is intended by the bill to at all interfere with the manufacture of "goods of substantially the same descriptive properties as those referred to in the registration of any trade-mark," unless they have that trade-mark upon them.

Mr. CONKLING. It is intended to do, as I understand it, what is plainly expressed as the Senator will see in line 8 of section 1. I call his attention to these words: "to which"—that is, to the commodities that he has referred to—"or to the package in which the same are put up, is fraudulently affixed said trade-mark."

Mr. DAWES. So far as this section is concerned I can see it very plainly; but rather than study the bill through I preferred to ask the Senator whether it is intended to make a monopoly in the manufacture of goods substantially of the same description unless there has been a fraudulent use of the trade-mark?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all, as I understand. It is intended to provide penalties against those who knowingly and fraudulently pirate the trade-marks.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I supposed the bill to be, but the Senator will see the object of my inquiry. There are goods, cloths for instance, manufactured for different and rival establishments, very much like, that would come under this substantial description and some one gets the advantage, as he has a right to, by having a trade-mark. I did not know whether it were possible by any construction of any part of the bill to give the exclusive right of manufacture of goods substantially like those covered by this trade-mark.

Mr. CONKLING. The committee understood, I am sure, as I understand, that this bill makes throughout the criterion of liability turn upon an element which is this, or equivalent to this:

To which, or to the package in which the same are put up, is fraudulently affixed said trade-mark, or any colorable imitation thereof, calculated to deceive the public, knowing the same to be counterfeit or not the genuine goods referred to in said registration.

Mr. DAWES. This section is perfectly correct.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator will find that the same thing runs all through.

Mr. DAWES. If I put it in another form the Senator will see what I am trying to take care of. Suppose that two men manufacture an article of cloth substantially alike, not absolutely alike, and one of them has a trade-mark, does this bill give him the exclusive right of making all articles substantially of that character?

Mr. CONKLING. If that were in the bill, owing to the frame of the bill, the honorable Senator will see it would be found in one of the first three sections, because he will observe that after the third section the provisions of the bill relate to matters not falling within the scope of his inquiry. Speaking then of three sections I think the remarks I am about to make will be apparent on their face, and they are very brief. The intention is to make the scienter, the guilty knowledge or the guilty motive the hinge on which the whole thing turns. Accordingly the Senator will see in the second section:

That every person who fraudulently affixes, or causes or procures to be fraudulently affixed, any trade-mark registered pursuant to the statutes of the United States, or any colorable imitation thereof, calculated to deceive the public, to any goods, of substantially the same descriptive properties.

In the third section:

That every person who fraudulently fills, or causes or procures to be fraudulently filled, any package to which is affixed any trade-mark, registered pursuant to the statutes of the United States, or any colorable imitation thereof, calculated to deceive the public.

And so on.

Mr. DAWES. They all apply to the use of the mark.

Mr. CONKLING. Entirely, as I understand, and not only so but to its fraudulent use.

Mr. DAWES. I am very desirous in co-operating in the passage of a bill with that intent.

Mr. CONKLING. If we have succeded in doing what we tried to do, we have done that.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEVENSON of Illinois, and Mr. G. W. HENDEE of Vermont managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the Districtof Columbia, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. L. T. NEAL of Ohio, Mr. JULIAN HARTRIDGE of Georgia, and Mr. GEORGE WILLARD of Michigan managers at the conference on its part.

REPAVEMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Messrs. DORSEY, SPENCER, and RANDOLPH were appointed the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT TAX BILL.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SPENCER, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. EATON.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to be excused from serving on the committee of conference on the tax bill.

Mr. SPENCER was excused from serving on the conference committee; and Mr. EDMUNDS was appointed in his place.

Mr. INGALLS. My engagements are such that I shall be unable to serve as a manager on the part of the Senate on the conference between the two Houses upon the District tax bill. I therefore ask that I may be excused.

Mr. INGALLS was excused; and, the President pro tempore being authorized to fill the vacancy, Mr. ROBERTSON was appointed.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1771.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Railroads reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out "6," in line 4, and insert "3;" so as to read:

March 3, 1863.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 14, after the word "grant," to strike out:

Which has expired by limitation of law.

And in lieu thereof insert:

Or earned by the completion of said road.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after the words "subject to," in line 16, the words:

Entry only under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Be disposed of under the provisions of law relating to the public lands of the United States.

So as to make the bill read:

That all lands which were granted by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, to the State of Kansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad commencing at Leavenworth, Kansas, and running, by way of the town of Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing of the Osage River, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa River, to a point on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, where said road intersects the Neosho River, and which have not been patented to said railroad company by the United States under said grant, or earned by the completion of said road, are hereby declared forfeited to the United States, and shall hereafter be subject to be disposed of under the provisions of law relating to the public lands of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator who reported this bill explain its general effect.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. HITCHCOCK,] I think, reported this bill, but with his permission I will briefly explain its purpose. It is of so unprecedented and unparalleled a character that I do not wonder it has aroused the suspicion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has not aroused my suspicion; I only desire to understand it.

Mr. INGALLS. It is extraordinary from the fact that it proposes to restore to the public lands of the United States about thirty thousand acres which had been previously granted to the State of Kansas for the purpose of constructing certain railroads. Among the railroads named in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, was what is known now as the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad. By the terms of that act the roads were to be completed within ten years from the date of its approval, which expired on the 3d of March, 1873. At that date the road had not been completed, and there were remaining unearned and unpatented about thirty thousand acres of land, which since that time have not been open to settlement or pre-emption as public lands from the fact that this act was still in existence upon the statute-books. The object of this bill is simply to declare a forfeiture of those lands and to effectuate their restoration to market.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know what my friend from Kansas meant by "suspicion." If the object of this bill is, as he states it, to assert the rights of the United States against all railroad companies who have not complied, or any one railroad company that has not complied with the conditions on which it had grants, then I am most heartily with him, as I have been in all such cases all the time. But I am not willing to undertake to forfeit a grant for the benefit of the United States and for the benefit of settlers when afterward it will turn out that we have forfeited it in violation of law, and, therefore, have to make good in money or otherwise the claim of any railroad company. I suppose my friend from Kansas stands in exactly the same attitude with myself, desiring to give everybody his legal rights and nothing else. If I am wrong, I hope my friend will correct me.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator never is wrong.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I take it I am right on this particular occasion.

Mr. INGALLS. Undeniably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that, Mr. President, I move to amend this bill by adding after the word "grant" in line 14 these words:

And to which said company are not lawfully entitled.

Whether they have got a patent or not, if they have gone so far that the law gives them the land, then we ought not to forfeit the land we have given to them. If they are not entitled to the land, then I quite agree with the Senator in this case and in every other that if these corporations who get land grants do not come up to the full measure of the conditions upon which they were granted they ought to have no favor except in very special instances that I do not think of at this moment; but the right of the United States ought to be asserted; and in order to guard against their having any claim upon us hereafter I wish to make the dividing line between their rights and ours the dividing line that the law as it now stands will establish. In order to guard against the possibility of it I propose after the word "grant" to insert the words "and to which said company are not lawfully entitled."

Mr. INGALLS. That makes a very bad phrase in the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "And which have not been patented to said railroad company by the United States under said grant, and to which said company are not lawfully entitled."

Mr. INGALLS. "Or earned by the completion of said road."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That can be corrected easily enough.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose the Senator will correct it if he offers to amend it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. But I can only do one thing at a time.

I can correct it by proposing my amendment after the word "road;" so as to read:

And which have not been patented to said railroad company by the United States under said grant or earned by the completion of the said road, and to which the said company are not lawfully entitled, are hereby declared forfeited.

That will make sense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only offer it, I will say, in the interest of protecting the United States against any claim that we have interfered in any way with the present lawful rights of the company. Of course, whatever their lawful rights are, we are bound to protect and not destroy. Whatever their lawful rights do not entitle them to, I am entirely with the Senator from Kansas in saying they shall not have.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SURGEON-GENERAL CLEMENT A. FINLEY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up House bill No. 2387, which will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2387) to fix the retired pay of Surgeon-General Clement A. Finley, retired, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the retired pay of Surgeon-General Clement A. Finley, on the retired list of the Army, shall hereafter be the retired pay now allowed by law for the grade of the Surgeon-General of the Army as fixed by the act of June 23, 1874, re-organizing the several staff corps of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT W. PRESTON.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 928) for the relief of Albert W. Preston.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Albert W. Preston, who was, on December 15, 1870, duly retired from the active service and placed upon the list of retired officers of the United States Army, with the full rank of colonel, on account of wounds received in battle while performing the duties of colonel in command of his regiment, shall be excepted and relieved from the operations of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, and to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army," approved March 3, 1875, solely because the injuries received by him in battle are more severe, dangerous, and disabling, and more fully incapacitate and disqualify him for any service than the loss of an arm or leg, or the permanent disability of an arm or leg by resection, and that he shall hereafter hold and receive the rank and pay of colonel upon the list of retired officers of the Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the Senator from Illinois to explain this. I see it refers to another case.

Mr. LOGAN. It refers to the bill for Crawford. There is a report with the bill, but I can state the case in a few words. Colonel Preston was included in the act that retired Crawford. By an examination of the surgeon it is shown that although he was included in the bill, and not excepted with persons who have arms off, eyes out, &c., his wounds were more severe than those of persons excepted. We make this exception, showing in the report that he was more severely wounded than those who were excepted in the law. This is for the purpose of adding this case to the exceptions.

I will say further that this case is one of such a character that I do not think it will form any class of exceptions or any precedent for any one else. The report is made in order that it shall not be a precedent for anybody else.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ISAAC STROHM, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having failed to agree with the Senate conferees, the House had further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate insisted on by the Senate to the said bill, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. J. B. CLARK, jr., of Missouri, and Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine managers at the conference on its part.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

J. R. WEST,
H. HAMLIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. HOLMAN,
J. H. BLOUNT,
HENRY WALDRON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WEST. As this bill involves such material interests, I think there is a propriety in making a brief statement to the Senate of the points of difference existing between the two Houses. I will state that in the main there has been an agreement between both committees as to the amounts of money separately and specifically appropriated in the bill. Where there have been any disagreements on those amounts they have attached to and been part of the legislative provisions upon which the two committees could not agree. Those legislative provisions are embraced under three heads: First, the amount of transportation paid to the railroad companies for carrying the mail; second, the compensation to be allowed to postmasters throughout the country; and, third, the rates of postage upon third-class matter.

On the first proposition, as to mail transportation, the committee on the part of the Senate found, upon consultation with the officers of the Department, that they could recommend to the Senate a very material abatement of the amount provided by the amendment of the Senate. In other words, the proposition was an appropriation of seventeen and a half millions for the general mail transportation, the Senate adopting the amount that the House proposed for what is known as the star and steamboat service, differing, however, with the House on the amount for railroad transportation; but we were willing to cut that amount down to $9,600,000, which would be, in our opinion, an abatement of about $800,000 upon that item. The committee on the part of the Senate were met by a proposition from the House to apply a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. to the compensations given to railroad companies. When the existing rates of transportation were established, it will be remembered by the Senate with what reluctance they were accepted by the railroad companies. At that time the intimations, if not threats, were somewhat quite common that the railroad companies would refuse to carry the mails for any such rates; but the issue was adjusted, and operations have been carried on under that law since that time. Now it is apparent, and it is not even denied by the Senate committee of conference, that these rates are fully equal to what ought to be paid, if not in excess of what should be paid by the Government. But your committee hesitated about entering upon any such wholesale reduction, knowing very well that it would not only do great injustice to the minor railroads, but possibly result in the temporary stoppage and refusal of the larger companies to carry what are known as the fast-mail trains and also the railway postal service. The committee on the part of the Senate proposing therefore to the House that this amount should not exceed the sum of $9,600,000 for the ensuing year, also made the following proposition with reference to such an intelligent examination of the subject as would enable Congress to act advisedly upon it:

That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint a commission of three skilled and competent persons who shall examine into the subject of transportation of the mails by railroad companies, and report to Congress at the commencement of its next session such rules and regulations for such transportation and for compensation therefor as shall in their opinion be just and expedient, and enable the Department to fulfill the required and necessary service for the public.

And appropriating $10,000 for the purpose. The Senate committee of conference, consisting of myself and the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, were unwilling at the present time to enter upon any radical changes that might not really accomplish the object had in view. We really believe that if this matter is submitted to an intelligent commission they will be able to present such a proposition, involving the three elements of space, speed, and weight, by the next session of Congress as will enable us to save largely and justly in this expenditure.

With regard to the item of compensation of postmasters the two committees agreed by mutual concessions down to a certain point. The House proposition was to limit commissions to $1,200 and box rents to the same amount. The Senate proposition was $1,500 for each of these items. We met on the intermediate ground of $1,350 each, the Senate proposing, however, that under this scaling of compensation, as there would be a large reduction on what are known as first-class offices receiving salaries amounting to $4,000 each, in the cases of Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia there should be a salary paid of $5,000 each, while the other offices which now get $4,000 are reduced by the scale of compensation below $4,000. Thus, for example, the postmaster in Richmond would get $3,000 a year and the postmaster in Chicago would get $5,000. That proposition was not acceptable to the House committee; and the Senate conceded still further by putting the maximum limit on all first-class offices at $4,000, with the exception of the city of New York, and upon the compensation of the officer there the committee divided. The compensation to the postmaster at New York was fixed by law some two years ago at $8,000, and the committee of conference on the part of the House proposed to reduce it to $7,000. To that the Senate committee objected, considering that the amount then fixed was none too much, and in fact not adequate to the character of the duties and the extent of responsibility imposed upon that officer. I do not know that we should have divided on that had there not been other matters to submit; but the result is that we were only $1,000 apart on the compensation of one postmaster, the Senate conceding every material point.

The remaining proposition is as to the rate of postage upon what is known as third-class matter. The bill as it came from the House proposed to restore the old rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof upon all merchandise. The Senate proposed to stand on the present law, one cent per ounce, conceiving that it is nothing more than just, without even being an adequate compensation for the carriage of this matter. The House also declined to accede to the proposition of the Senate committee, that transient newspapers and magazines shall be admitted to, and be transmitted in, the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces or fractional part thereof, and that all printed matter except books and unsealed circulars shall go under that rate, it being contended by the committee on the part of the Senate that unsealed circulars originating in business motives, and designed to promote the individual interest of every man that sends them out, being treated as letters and handled as letters, should pay as much as any first-class matter, and a departure from that rule would involve the Department in a loss of some half a million a year on that item alone. The other open question was on books, and those the Senate committee insisted on treating as merchandise.

In view of the fact that I shall ask for the insistence of the Senate to the points of difference now existing between the two bodies, I have thought it proper to make these explanations to the Senate. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by that body.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to add a single word to what the chairman of the conference committee has said. I did not hear him state what I propose now to state, that, from the information which we had in our possession and about which we had no doubt, the horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. off railroad transportation would stop every fast-mail train that runs in the country. The Senator says he stated it; I did not hear him.

Mr. WEST. I am glad to have it repeated.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to add besides that there would not be the saving of one single mill if you were to simply lower the rates of what you call fast trains by paying for a less amount of weight and transferring that weight to another road. That is to say, your fast trains carry so many tons a day, and upon the basis of the present law they are entitled to so much. If you change the compensation paid to them by limiting them to 10 or any per cent. less, you will simply transfer the matter largely so that it will go over other and slower roads, and there would not in truth and in fact be the saving of a single dollar.

I hope that no committee appointed by this body will go into that committee-room and make the concessions which we have made. We have made them to a point that was hardly due to the character of this body, but we did it in the hope of coming to an agreement. That agreement having failed, I hope no other committee of this body will make such concessions as we made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. In view of the statement by the committee of conference in reference to the post-office appropriation bill, I move, the Senate concurring, that the same committee be re-appointed. This has been done by the other House in some instances.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that the House have notified us of the appointment of a different committee on their part. I think, considering the exigency of matters with reference to these bills, it would be very much better for us to vary the committee. I have no doubt that any committee appointed would fairly and fully represent the Senate. At the same time a committee of conference must be free; it must have room for discretion. While observing the spirit of its House, it must meet the other House in a fair and liberal way; and where the House of Representatives itself has sent another committee, implying a disposition on its part to accommodate the differences between the two Houses, it seems to me the Senate ought to do the same thing.

Mr. LOGAN. The reason I made the motion was that the Senators who had spoken had shown that there was reasonableness exhibited on the part of the conferees of the Senate in trying to agree with the House. In one or two other instances the same committee has been appointed by the House. I do not think that is the best way to do it always. I was only following out the programme established by the House in one or two other instances; and as our conferees had gone as far as they thought we ought to go in the way of reductions, and as far as they would advise any other conferees to go, I thought it would be proper and right to appoint the same persons.

Mr. SARGENT. Where the same committee of conference on the part of the Senate is appointed, that is almost in the nature of stating that we adhere. The House of Representatives have not done that in this case. They have sent a modified committee, and I think it would be well for the Senate to meet them at least half way. Each House has its own independence and dignity to look after. I do not object to any Senator in a committee of conference being mindful of those whom he represents on the committee; but at the same time it seems to me it would be better for us to go as far as the House does at any rate toward agreeing on this bill. I think the Senator will see the force of that and perhaps withdraw his motion.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senate have a right to do as they choose, but I shall not withdraw the motion. I am willing always, as far as I am concerned, to meet the other House half way; but when a liberal spirit has been shown on the part of the Senate in reference to a conference, and when the House has appointed the same conference committee the second time in one or two instances, indicating to us an intention to adhere, I think it would be as well for us to show our own disposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the ordinary course will be pursued of having a free conference; that at this stage of the matter, at any rate, there will be nothing like a repetition of the same committee, which is never a good thing to do at any time, and certainly it ought not to be done until the Senate approaches a point when it is determined to adhere to its position. I suggest, therefore, that the Senator from Illinois, for the present at least, should allow the conference committee to be appointed in the usual way.

The new conference always includes one of the old conferees, in order that he may represent the differences between the two Houses, as already gone over, and then two new members. That is the usual course, I believe, unless they approach a condition where each House has made up its mind to adhere. Then it is right enough to appoint the same committee of conference.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no disposition to persist if the Senator thinks there is any impropriety in what I have proposed; but I noticed on the part of the Senate some time ago that one of the same Senators who now insist on making a change was appointed on the same conference committee two or three times, and all that occurred was to meet and adjourn merely, because there was no agreement at all. I was on one of the committees myself. I merely suggested it in the line of what had been done heretofore. If the gentlemen who are running these bills have no disposition to stand by them, I have nothing to say.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know to whom the Senator refers, but if he means to imply that I have no disposition to stand by the bills as the Senate passed them he is very much mistaken; that is all.

NELSON TIFFANY.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1337.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLAYTON. This will take but a minute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it about?

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the bill be read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany, which is a direction to the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from Nelson Tiffany, late a private in Company H, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no act of Congress necessary for that.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire what there is in this case that makes it necessary?

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a question of pay connected with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the matter be stated. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is a report which can be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs on the 20th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany, submit the following report:

We find that Nelson Tiffany was enlisted in Company A, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, on the 16th September, 1861, and was honorably discharged on May 15, 1865. He was severely wounded on May 9, 1864, and was sent to hospital at Bermuda Hundreds, from thence to Fortress Monroe, and finally to hospital at New Haven, Connecticut, from which place he received a furlough from June 17 for thirty days, which was extended to August 7, 1864, and at its expiration he reported to medical director at Boston, and by him sent to Readville, Massachusetts, on 10th October, being directed to report back to New Haven, Connecticut. He, being in a worn-out and broken down condition from wounds and sickness, believed he would never recover. He returned to his home at Auburn, Massachusetts, and then reported to the provost-marshal at Worcester, Massachusetts, and was by him sent to Fort Independence, and there remained till his discharge, on May 15, 1865. The records show that Tiffany was a faithful soldier, and he is believed now to be upon his death-bed from wounds received in the war. The committee believe, from all the evidence in the case, that Nelson Tiffany never intended to desert, and they recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I now call up the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] to reconsider the vote by which the House on day before yesterday committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. No. 2798) to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago, with pending amendments. When this bill was before the House two days ago, I stated that I did not propose myself to occupy the time of the House in discussing it, although I was willing to allow any other gentleman to be heard who desired to speak upon it. But as some opposition to the bill was manifested in the House, which I did not anticipate, I propose now to say a few words explanatory of the provisions of the bill, in the first place, and, in the second place, in maintenance of the proposition that, under the Constitution, the Government of the United Sates has the power, not only to aid works of internal improvement by its countenance and encouragement, but also by material means if necessary.

In the first place, I will state in brief the provisions of this bill. It provides that the Government of the United States shall recognize a corporation, brought into existence under the laws of Virginia, which proposes to build a narrow-gauge railroad from a point on the line of the District of Columbia through the States of Virginia and West Virginia to the Ohio River, across that river near Point Pleasant, and then, taking its way through the State of Ohio, to Cincinnati; thence, through the States of Indiana and Illinois, to Chicago and Saint Louis.

The privilege is also granted to the company by this charter to extend its road through the District of Columbia by the city of Washington to Baltimore; but the road is not to be commenced through this District until a survey and maps of the route have been made and submitted to Congress for its approval.

The capital stock of the company is to be $15,000,000, including the expense of building a bridge across the Ohio River with double track, at a cost of $1,000,000. The bill otherwise contains all the ordinary provisions of railroad charters.

This charter provides for a narrow-gauge road. As to the system of narrow-gauge, or three-foot gauge, which has been adopted in many countries, and to a very considerable extent in our own country, the committee express no opinion upon the merits of that system; but they agree that whenever any company proposes a great work of internal improvement in this country, if it is willing to raise and expend its own money in furtherance of the same, the Government of the United States ought to give countenance and encouragement to it.

The narrow gauge system of railroads has been adopted to a great extent in several of the states of Europe, especially in Russia, in Sweden and Norway, and in Wales. It has also been adopted in Canada, where there are two such railroads of very considerable importance. It has also been introduced in several of the States of the Union. I refer particularly to the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, ninety miles in length, which we have been told is a great success.

The most conspicuous of these roads, called the "Festiniog railway," has been constructed in Wales, from a point about fourteen miles from the sea-shore to the mountains, opening up a great slate region. That road, in the language of those who have examined it, has proved a "wonderful success." I will give a statement of the advantages of the narrow-gauge railroad as claimed by an engineer who has examined this subject. Referring to this railroad in Wales, of which I have spoken, he says:

1. Its working expenses are only 44½ per cent. of its receipts, whereas on English lines of ordinary gauge they average 48 per cent.
2. It yields an interest of 29½ per cent. on the original capital, whereas ordinary lines yield only from 6 per cent. to nil.
3. The dead-load on the Festiniog railway is only one-third of the load carried, while on the ordinary gauge the dead-weight for similar freights is more than half the weight of the freight.
4. On the English lines of ordinary gauge the dead-load carried for each passenger is a ton or even more, while on the Festiniog system it may be reduced to five hundred weight.
5. The exceptionally narrow gauge effects a very large saving in first construction.
6. The loads being comparatively light, there is an immense saving in wear and tear.

That is the report of a very distinguished engineer upon that subject. Now, sir, when this bill was under consideration the other day the idea appeared to prevail that this charter contained some monstrous provision in violation of the rights of the States. I cannot suppose that any gentleman acquainted with me and my antecedents (for I have always been a State's-rights man) could believe that I, as chairman of any committee, would report to this House a bill which in any manner would violate the rights of the States of this Union. Gentlemen did not take the trouble to listen to the provisions of the bill, but ran away with the idea that this was a monstrous corporation, under which the rights of the States would be subverted. Now, I undertake to say that in no less than five provisions of the bill the rights of the States are amply secured and protected. I undertake to say that this corporation cannot proceed one step without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned. Those States could under the provisions of this bill, by direct or indirect legislation, stop this company at the very threshold of their territory. For the benefit of those gentlemen who may be inclined to oppose this bill on account of its supposed invasion of State's rights, I propose to read the provisions of the bill in that regard:

SEC. 4. That in case it shall be deemed advisable by the board of directors of said corporation to purchase, lease, consolidate with, or otherwise acquire any franchise or franchises from any other railroad, railway, or other company or corporation, as a portion of its main line or branches hereinbefore authorized, which said franchises are established under State charters or general laws, they are hereby empowered so to do; but in all cases the consent of the Legislature of the State granting the charter shall first be had, expressed in the form of law, unless such right shall be already recognized in the charter of said railway, railroad, or other company or corporation, or by the general laws of the State.

SEC. 6. That where the route of said railroad and its branches shall pass through the lands of private persons, or where it may be necessary for said railroad company to take any lands belonging to private persons for any of the purposes herein mentioned necessary to said road, such right of way through or title to such lands shall be secured in accordance with the laws of the State in which they may be situated.

SEC. 7. That the president and board of directors of this company may, and are hereby authorized to, appoint an agent or agents in any State through which the said line of road may pass, to secure subscriptions from cities, towns, townships, counties, corporations, joint-stock companies, and individuals, to the capital stock of the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company, payable in money, leases, lands, mines, labor, or material; and that the same may be collected under the laws of each State in which the same may be subscribed: Provided always, That such subscriptions can be lawfully made under the constitution and laws of such State.

SEC. 8. That the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company may avail itself of any of the provisions of the laws of the States through which the line of road may pass governing railroad companies, the same as if operating under a charter from such States, except as otherwise provided in this act.

Now, sir, I contend that according to these provisions any State through which this company may propose to run its road can by legislative enactment, by police regulations alone, defeat the very object and stop the work. But, sir, if any objection can be made on that score to the charter itself, I am sure the amendment offered by my friend from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] must remove any scruples of that kind. That amendment, which I accepted, reads as follows:

But said corporation shall not have authority to lay out, survey, or locate any line for its projected road in or through any State until said State shall by legislative enactment expressly confer the power so to do.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am almost afraid that the States' rights men of this House are running away with the idea of State rights in this advanced and enlightened age of our country.

Why, sir, they seem to be in advance of the old land-marks pointed out by Mr. Calhoun himself. While I was reared in a school of strict construction, yet I never allowed my strict construction to go beyond the authorities laid down expressly in the Constitution. For the benefit of those captious and factious gentlemen—and they will pardon me for using these terms—I propose to refer to some of the authors of the Constitution. I will premise this by the assertion that from Washington down, without almost a single exception, the Presidents of the United States, including the chief framer of the Constitution himself, have contended that works of internal improvement for the benefit of commerce between the States should not only be encouraged by the countenance of the Government, but, if need be, by actual support in material means. What says the Constitution, sir? That Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

I call the attention of gentlemen to the phraseology of that clause. It is not "between" the States of the Union but "among" the States. And Congress shall not only have power to regulate commerce but, I hold, the power to regulate commerce includes the power to provide the means of commerce. Congress has not only the power to regulate commerce between the States, as between the lines of territory, but among the States and through the States if necessary. It has this power as fully as it has the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." I wish to call the attention of the House to the language used by Mr. Jefferson, whose authority on State-rights, I imagine, will not be doubted by anybody. He was the very father of the democratic doctrine. Mr. Jefferson said in his first annual message to Congress:

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the four pillars of our prosperity, are then most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be seasonably interposed. If, in the course of your observations or inquiries, they should appear to need any aid within the limits of our constitutional powers, your sense of their importance is a sufficient assurance they will occupy your attention. We cannot, indeed, but feel an anxious solicitude for the difficulties under which our carrying trade will soon be placed. How far it can be relieved, otherwise than by time, is a subject of important consideration.

Again, Mr. Jefferson said in his sixth annual message to Congress, in speaking of the distribution of the surplus revenue in the Treasury:

Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear; their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties.

Where these eminent men at all doubted the constitutional power of Congress to aid great enterprises of internal improvement, they advised in their messages that amendment to the Constitution should be made so there would be no doubt on the question whatever of the power of the Federal Government in this regard.

Now, Mr. Jefferson said again in his last annual message to Congress, speaking of the revenue:

Or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States?

I propose also to read from Mr. Madison, the chief author of the Constitution, he who has been termed, and perhaps with more justice than any other individual, the very father of the Constitution. He said in one of his messages to Congress, and I beg gentlemen and especially Virginians, States' rights men, to listen to his words. I read from the seventh annual message of Mr. Madison:

Among the means of advancing the public interest the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can best be executed under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed upon them. There are none the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the Government whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field where nature invites more the art of man to complete her own work for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication in bringing and binding more close together the various parts of our extended Confederacy. While the States individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads, by navigable canals, and by improving the streams susceptible of navigation, the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings, requiring national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work; and it is a happy reflection, that any defect of constitutional authority which may be encountered can be supplied in a mode which the Constitution itself has providently pointed out.

Now, there is the express declaration of Mr. Madison, that the power existed in the Federal Government; that it not only existed, but ought to be exercised; and that if Congress should doubt the power of the General Government, it ought to take steps to amend the Constitution so all doubt in that regard should be removed.

Mr. Madison said in his eighth annual message:

And I particularly invite again their attention to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, and by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

I could go on and read from the messages of Mr. Monroe to the same effect; but I will read no more.

In Martin's Summary of the Law of Nations it is said:

Commerce consists in selling the superfluity; in purchasing articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures; in buying from one nation and selling to another; or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight.

What have been the decisions of our courts? What have been the opinions expressed by our great lawyers and our great judges? From Chief Justice Marshall, whose reputation was great, even when the Constitution was adopted, what were his opinions on this question? I refer to his opinion in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, a standard authority in this country, and with which every well-read lawyer is or ought to be familiar.

Chief Justice Marshall said:

The word used in the Constitution then comprehends, and has been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word "commerce." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. * * * Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary-line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. * * * Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each; and if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? The power of Congress then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States. The sense of the nation on this subject is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods by land between Baltimore and Providence, between New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore. We are now arrived at the inquiry, what is this power? It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1064, says:

It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that the terms of the Constitution have at all times been understood to include a power over navigation as well as trade, over intercourse as well as traffic.

The same definition, more minutely expressed, is found in the opinion of Justice Johnson in the case just cited:

Commerce, in its simplest signification, means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange become commodities, and enter into commerce, the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation; ship-building, the carrying trade, and the propagation of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess power to regulate commerce. (9 Wheaton, page 229.)

And, sir, I might refer to the ablest and most distinguished writer upon railroads and their privileges under the Government of the United States, Mr. Redfield, by whom this power is clearly explained and proved to exist by the best authority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I am a State-rights man, I am in favor of the General Government giving its encouragement and support to all works of internal improvement, and especially to railroads. Railroads make up the great spirit of this age. What has made our country conspicuous for its commerce, for its population, for its advance in wealth and grandeur more than the great system of railroads which has been established throughout her borders?

Look, sir, on the other side of the ocean, over the world. See how great countries are struggling to advance their commercial interests by the establishment of railroads. Not only are they doing this within their own borders, but they are extending them wherever they have dominions on the surface of the earth. Look at England in her colony of Sierra Leone and at France in her colony of Senegal. These two governments are extending railroads from those colonies into the interior of Africa, opening vast districts and proposing to penetrate undiscovered countries, where thousands and hundred of thousands of people are supposed to exist that now we know nothing of.

Why, sir, what has caused the States north of us to advance in so much greater a degree than the States south of us? What, but their inaugurating a system of railroads which in the South we have not? I might compare my own State which has made considerable advance in this regard to the States farther north; to Ohio, for instance, coming into the Union ten years after the State of Kentucky, and which to-day has twice the wealth and more than twice the population and more than twice the number of railroad miles that Kentucky has. Or look at Indiana, coming into the Union twenty-five years after the State of Kentucky, and see how greatly she has advanced in this regard; or Illinois, coming into the Union nearly thirty years after the State of Kentucky, and now standing great and prosperous in advance of her older sisters, with over seven thousand miles of railroad.

Sir, I hold it to be the duty of Congress to give its countenance and support to every great enterprise of this sort which tends to develop the commerce of this country and, more, which tends to bring about a feeling of harmony, fellowship, and unity, without which our country cannot long endure. I hope, sir, that all objections to this measure and to some other measures which I shall propose to this House of a similar character may before Congress adjourns be waived, and that we shall all unite in the great effort to build up our common country. And what means can we adopt with this view better than to carry on the great system of railroads already inaugurated, and which is far in advance of the system of railroads in any other country of the world? Let us by these means give opportunity to every company of individuals who propose to raise their own money to build railroads, to penetrate our forests, to extend through our valleys, to ascend our mountains, and to bring into cultivation our great territory, and to bring, as I said before, into harmony and unity this great people. Thus, sir, when we shall become iron-banded as we are ocean-bounded, when we shall become a prosperous, fully-developed, and harmonious nation, we may then present ourselves pre-eminently great and glorious to mankind, and, if need be, we can withstand the shocks of a united world in arms against us.

Mr. SAVAGE. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a singular bill, to say the least of it, to be championed by a gentleman who claims to be such a par excellence States' rights man. Of course, living on the north side of the Ohio River as I do, it would not be expected that I would claim to be such an extreme States' rights man as the gentleman who has just taken his seat. Neither do I intend to follow him in the course of argument he has offered in relation to this question of constitutional right in the Congress of the United States to legislate in the direction in which the gentleman has claimed we have a right to legislate. But I propose briefly to call attention to some of the provisions of this bill which I think are objectionable, and ought not to receive the countenance of this House.

The gentleman tells us that he would not as chairman of a committee report any bill which had the slightest tendency to interfere with the question of State rights.

Now, I do not know how the gentleman understands State rights. But here is a bill which it was when first reported, before any amendment had been offered to it, chartered a railroad running through three or four States of this Union, which was to be authorized by the laws of the United States without the consent and without even asking the consent of a single State through whose borders it was proposed that it should pass. And yet the gentleman says he is in favor of no measure in conflict with the doctrine of State rights. As the bill was originally proposed, though to some extent that defect has been cured by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] it proposed to charter a railroad corporation to go through these several States, and they were not so much as to say to the Legislatures of those States "By your leave." The intention was to give this corporation full, unlimited, and complete authority to go through all these States without once saying to the people or the Legislatures of those States, "We ask your consent to do so."

Now, what else is there in this bill? I say that even now, as the bill at present stands, it places this corporation entirely above all State legislative control, as much so as it is possible for legislative provisions to have that effect. The Legislatures of the States through which this road is to pass cannot pass one single statute to regulate the road in any particular, except as regards police regulations and the crossings of other railroads and canals. In all other particulars this corporation is to be as absolutely independent of the States through which it passes as it is possible by a law of Congress to make it. No provision in the bill, no sentence in the bill, can be construed to give any power to a State Legislature upon this subject, so far as this bill is concerned.

Furthermore, the Congress of the United States cannot legislate so far as the rates of travel and transportation over this road are concerned, except as such legislation shall apply to all the railroads chartered by the Congress of the United States. Whatever objectionable features there may be in the congressional legislation concerning the Pacific railroads, whatever rights those roads may have acquired from the Congress of the United States to which the people now object, however wrongfully may be any principle or tendency of those Pacific railroads, the same thing is continued by this bill as it stands, and Congress cannot in any one single particular legislate as to this railroad unless the same legislation shall apply to every Pacific railroad chartered by Congress.

The gentleman has referred to the eleventh section of this bill to show that it is State rights in its tendency, and that it gives some authority to the Congress of the United States. I will read that section:

That the said corporation, in constructing its said road, shall conform to all the laws and regulations of the several States through which it may pass—

How conform? To what extent?

in relation to crossings of other railroads, and public roads, and canals and navigable waters, or other streams within the jurisdiction and control of said States—

It is not to conform to the laws and regulations of these several States in any other particulars except as to crossings of other railroads and public roads, and canals and navigable streams—and shall be subject to all general police regulations established by the general laws of such States

Now, if this road is to be chartered by the Congress of the United States—and for the time being on this occasion I do not propose to enter into a discussion whether Congress has or has not the power to charter this corporation, but if you concede the power why should Congress put a corporation into the State of Ohio, for instance, with no power in the Legislature of that State to legislate in regard to it except as to police regulations and in relation to crossing railroads, canals, and navigable streams in the State?

There is one other section to which I shall call attention. It provides:

That Congress shall at all times, whenever, in its judgment, the public good requires it, have the right to interpose its authority to regulate the rates of travel and transportation on the said railroad by general laws applicable to all railroads constructed under charters granted by the Government of the United States.

They must be general laws. There can be no special legislation, no legislation with reference to this road except such as will apply to every railroad chartered by the Congress of the United States.

Now, one other thing. The gentleman has, I think, unconsciously exposed where the real gist of this thing lies. He has attempted to demonstrate that this House has the right to grant subsidies in aid of railroads. Here is the real milk in this cocoanut. The charter to this company would be of little benefit unless there was in prospect a subsidy at the back of it. I say here that, in my opinion, if this bill shall pass and become a law, within less than three sessions of Congress after it becomes a law you will have this corporation knocking at your doors, and, under the advice of gentlemen who take the same position as the gentleman from Kentucky, asking for a subsidy to complete this railroad, and who will claim that you are in honor bound, having granted this charter, to see that it does not fall by the wayside.

Mr. NEAL. Did not the bill as originally introduced provide that this road should receive a subsidy?

Mr. SAVAGE. I was coming to that. This bill, as originally introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, provided for the indorsement or guarantee of the United States to the extent of $14,000,000 or $15,000,000. The committee have left out that provision for reasons which it would not be very difficult to understand. The proposition now is to rush through this bill, as the gentleman undertook to do the other day under the demand of the previous question, without any discussion at all.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The gentleman will allow me to say that I made no such demand; he knows very well that I expressed the desire to have this bill discussed.

Mr. SAVAGE. The record of the proceedings of this House shows that the gentleman did demand the previous question upon this bill, and it was after the failure of the gentleman to have his demand sustained that the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; but it was done by me under the supposition that no one desired to discuss the bill; and I am surprised that the gentleman, a member of the Committee——

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is out of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] is entitled to the floor without interruption, unless he yields it.

Mr. SAVAGE. Now, as I said before, the whole object of granting this charter, and the reason why this railroad corporation did not in the first place go to the Legislatures of the different States for authority to run this railroad, was to place the road above and beyond the control of the State Legislatures, and in the end to have a claim upon the Congress of the United States for a guarantee of the interest of the bonds of the company.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The gentleman has no right to make any such assumption.

Mr. SAVAGE. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the records of this House bear me out in the statement that this corporation has come before our committee asking for a subsidy.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. It did no such thing.

Mr. SAVAGE. The gentleman says it did no such thing. I have here a copy of that bill as originally offered, and I propose to call attention to one of its provisions. The eleventh section provides:

That for the purpose of determining the amount of aid to be rendered by the United States, the said railroad is hereby divided into two divisions, one of four hundred miles westward from its commencement opposite to the District of Columbia, including a double-track bridge across the Ohio River, and extending through the rough country on the right bank of said river, which is hereby denominated the mountain division, and the residue of seven hundred miles, including the main line to Saint Louis and the Chicago branch, which is hereby denominated the western division; and the indorsement of interest to be guaranteed by the United States shall be at the rate of $17,500 for each mile of said four hundred miles of said mountain division, and at the rate of $10,000 per mile for each mile of said western division.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The committee did not report that bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. This is the same corporation; and this is the proposition which that company in the first place desired our committee to indorse and bring before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. But the committee refused to do it.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will state all the facts.

Mr. SAVAGE. I propose to do so. Our committee, I know, refused to grant the subsidy; but I am maintaining that the passage by Congress of this charter is only the first step and will ultimately end in a demand for the very subsidy which has been refused by our committee, with the added argument that the Congress of the United States has passed the charter and given the company its rights, and that we are in honor bound to see that the enterprise does not fail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think there has been perhaps as much discussion upon this question as the temper of the House desires; and I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. DAVY. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. SAVAGE. I insist on my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. DAVY. I would like to say one word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to put a parliamentary question. It was I who made the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House committed this bill to the Committee of the Whole. I am going to appeal to the courtesy of the House, and I know the Chair will sustain me in that appeal.

Mr. SAVAGE. In order to avoid any difficulty, I would inquire of the Chair how much time I would have if I should withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. About twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SAVAGE. Then I withdraw the motion, and yield to the gentleman from Virginia twenty-four minutes, so that at the close of his remarks I may have an opportunity to renew the motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make a speech, but merely to state the facts in connection with the position which this bill now occupies.

I hope the House, in courtesy to the Speaker if not to myself, will consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole, so that it may be brought back before the House for its action at such time as the pleasure of the House may determine. The facts were these: When this question was under discussion the other day my friend from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, and on that motion not more than fifty members perhaps voted, developing much less than a quorum. The gentleman from Kentucky who had charge of the bill objected to any action being taken in the absence of a quorum, but in the confusion prevailing in the House and during a colloquy between him and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] the gentleman from Kentucky said he withdrew his objection. As I understand from him now, he meant to say that the gentleman from Ohio had withdrawn his objection, but the Chair understanding him as I did, that is, as withdrawing his objection to the call of a quorum, I at once renewed the objection, but in the confusion the Chair could not hear me, although, as the Chair is aware, I generally speak very distinctly. But I appeal to the RECORD, I appeal to the Journal, to show that I made in time the objection which would have saved the bill from going to the Committee of the Whole. I now ask unanimous consent (and I am sure that in this request I shall have the concurrence of the Chair, in view of the fact that I made the point in time but was not heard by the Chair)—I ask unanimous consent that the bill be placed back in its original position on the Calendar. If the House will unanimously consent, in courtesy to the Chair and to myself, to place the bill back in its original position, I shall not then desire to argue the question; otherwise I wish to occupy a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the House that at the time the vote was taken upon the motion to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union there was not a quorum present. The House was proceeding to divide by tellers, of which the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] being the mover of the bill, was one. There was some confusion in front of the Speaker's desk, as there is always when the House is dividing by tellers, but, as appears by the RECORD, and the recollection of the Chair is the same, the announcement was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] "I withdraw the call for a further count." The tellers immediately retired, and members who were passing between them separated and went to their several seats. At this time the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] made a motion to take up another bill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] claims that before the gentleman from Kentucky made the motion to take up another bill, he himself objected to the arrangement, and it appears by the RECORD that the gentleman from Virginia after the Speaker pro tempore had decided the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the House was proceeding to other business, said "I object to that agreement." The Chair did not hear the gentleman, and he is mistaken in stating that the Journal shows that he objected. It does appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It was taken down by the reporter and I never spoke to him about it. He heard it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It seems that inadvertently the rights of the gentleman from Virginia have been somewhat affected. If the House choose, they can reconsider the motion to refer, and may by unanimous consent place the bill in the position it then was on the Calendar, or, having reconsidered the motion to refer, they can again take a vote on the question of reference. The Chair would be sorry if, even through misapprehension, he should so rule as to deprive any member of his rights. He will say, however, in justice to himself, that he did not hear the gentleman from Virginia until the House had proceeded to other business and was dividing on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I have no objection to the consideration of the question whether it shall be to reconsider or to putting the question again whether the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but I think a vote of the House should be taken either whether the reference shall be reconsidered or on further consideration the bill shall again be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to be heard on that question.

Mr. SAVAGE. Must not the question first be taken on my motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman yielded to me twenty-four out of the twenty-five minutes remaining of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Virginia desires to discuss the question of reconsideration, it is perfectly proper for him to do so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is what I propose to do. I hold the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SAVAGE. I yielded twenty-four minutes of my time, retaining one minute of the time the Chair said I had for the purpose of moving to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am not prepared, Mr. Speaker, to enter into a discussion of the merits of this bill to-day upon this motion. I had thought that on a bare statement of the facts, as it appears by the RECORD, and as stated by myself, this House would unanimously agree to re-instate the bill upon the Calendar in the House, and thus save further time, but I am driven to the necessity of arguing this question lest the House may not understand the merits of the bill, although at the same time it cannot be expected I should go into the argument of the constitutional question, involving important matters, in so short a time. I must therefore confine myself to the brief statement of the points of the bill, with some reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio who last held the floor.

What is the purport of the bill? A charter was granted by the State of Virginia for the purpose of incorporating a railroad company called the Washington City, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Narrow-Gauge Railroad, that authorized the making of a road from the city of Washington to the city of Saint Louis, with a branch to the city of Chicago. Of course Virginia could give no rights outside of her own limits. The friends of this company found the laws of the several States through which this road passed were different, and that some of the constitutions, especially that of West Virginia, prohibited the granting of any special charter, and I believe it is so in some of the other States, and consequently to undertake to procure that charter from each separate State through which this road passed would have been utterly impossible. It would have been impossible to have procured a harmonious system which would have worked without jarring and without clogging, because some States would certainly have imposed conditions inconsistent with the interests of other States and inconsistent with the well-being and harmony of the road. Secondly, it was necessary to have a uniform charter acting in all the States alike. But whether they have the right or not to charter this road, whether Congress has the power under the Constitution, is not material to the discussion of this question, and the most tender-footed and hair-splitting State-rights man need not permit his mind to be troubled upon the questions involved in this bill, because it is made subject to the approbation of each State through which it passes.

I offered the original bill at the request of a portion of my constituents, just as it had been prepared by its friends, to be considered by the committee, reserving the right to myself to oppose any of its provisions which I did not approve. There were such in the bill. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to discuss them now, as the amended bill is that on which the House is called to act.

One of the amendments to the bill is as follows:

Provided, That Congress reserves the right to regulate by law the rates of fare of passengers and of freights on said railroad and its branches.

Another amendment provides that—

This act may be amended or repealed by Congress at any time.

Another amendment adopted is as follows:

The charter which shall be granted shall not take effect in any State when the Legislature thereof shall by resolution object to the same.

And then there was the further amendment adopted on the motion of my colleague, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] as follows:

But said corporation shall not have authority to lay out, survey, or locate any land for its projected road in or through any State until said State shall by legislative enactment expressly confer the power so to do.

That is, that the charter shall not take effect in any State until the Legislature of said State shall by special act approve of it and give it sanction. Then, sir, where is the violation of the rights of the State? If the State says the road should not invade the domain of that State, that is the end of it. We take the risk. This bill is laid before the Legislatures of the different States and they determine whether they will or will not have it. If they say they will not have it, then the action of Congress has no effect.

Some of my friends on my right may say that they object to this bill because it concedes everything to the States and yields too much of the power of Congress.

But my friend from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] says that Congress has reserved no right over the subject. What rights would he have Congress reserve other than those that are reserved, the right to regulate freights and to regulate fares? But he says the States through which the road may pass have no such right. Ought a State through which a railroad passes to have the right by law to regulate the fares of passengers and the rates of freight, unless it be local fares and freights? Do the States as a general thing do that for their own road? The State has a right, after looking at this charter, to determine for itself whether it will grant it or not; and if it determines to let this road pass through it without the power of regulating the rates for the transportation of persons or of property, why then it does so with a full knowledge of the fact and ought not to undertake to do it. On the other hand, the States may impose conditions upon their acceptance, which would be binding on the company.

The gentleman talks about States' rights. But individuals have rights as well as States. And while a State protects a man in the franchise of his home and his farm and gives him title to it, it has no right to say how he shall manage it when he comes into possession of it, how he shall plow it, and how he shall cultivate it.

But, sir, this bill provides that this shall be in addition a post-road. And the gentleman from Ohio denies upon this floor the right and the power of Congress to make a post-road; not only the right to adopt roads already in existence, but the right to make roads if it be necessary to carry the mails. Sir, under the old confederation Congress had only the power to establish post-offices; and it found after it established a post-office there might be no road to it, and no road might be made by a State. So when they came to adopt the Federal Constitution they added additional words giving the power to establish post-roads and post-offices. That principle was acted on by Mr. Jefferson as early as 1806. And that eminent commentator upon the Constitution, Judge Story, speaks of that limited construction of the Constitution wherein the power to make a post-road was denied, when the power to adopt one already made was conceded. That was the dividing line between those men who took the extreme view, as it was termed, of the limited power of the Government, and those who took the ground that the Government had a more enlarged power; that if it had the right to make a post-office it had the right to make a road to the post-office, for the reason that a post-office would be of no value unless you had a road to it. The gentleman beside me reminds me that Congress grants charters for bridges across streams where States are connected. Ohio and Virginia, or West Virginia, must come to Congress for a charter to organize a company to build a bridge for the purpose of connecting those States.

The gentleman from Ohio would argue that you have no right to make a post-road to carry the mails. Let me read what Mr. Story says as to that question:

> The whole practical course of the Government upon this subject, from its first organization down to the present time, under every administration has repudiated the strict and narrow construction of the words above mentioned.

That is, that Congress could only adopt a road already constructed.

> The fact, if true, that Congress have not hitherto made any roads for the carrying of the mail, would not affect the right or touch the question. It is not doubted that the power has been properly carried into effect by making certain State roads post-roads. When Congress found those roads suited to the purpose, there could be no constitutional reason for refusing to establish them as mail-routes. The exercise of authority was clearly within the scope of the power. But the argument would have it that because this exercise of the power, clearly within its scope, has been hitherto restrained to making existing roads post-roads, therefore Congress cannot proceed constitutionally to make a post-road where no road now exists. This is clearly what lawyers call a non sequitur. It might with just as much propriety be urged that because Congress had not hitherto used a particular means to execute any other given power, therefore it could not now do it. If, for instance, Congress had never provided a ship for the Navy except by purchase, they could not now authorize ships to be built for a navy, or a converso. If they had not laid a tax on certain goods, it could not now be done. If they had never erected a custom-house or court-house, they could not now do it. Such a mode of reasoning would be deemed by all persons wholly indefensible.
> But it is not admitted that Congress have not exercised this very power with reference to this very object. By the act of the 21st of April, 1806, (chapter 41,) the President was authorized to cause to be opened a road from the frontier of Georgia, on the route from Athens to New Orleans; and to cause to be opened a road or roads through the territory, then lately ceded by the Indians to the United States from the river Mississippi to the Ohio, and to the former Indian boundary line, which was established by the treaty of Greenville; and to cause to be opened a road from Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, to Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory. The same remark applies to the act of 29th of March, 1806, (chapter 19,) "to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio." Both of these acts were passed in the administration of President Jefferson, who it is well known on other occasions maintained a strict construction of the Constitution.

Thus says Mr. Justice Story; and I am sure, without intending any discourtesy to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SAVAGE,] that Justice Story, upon constitutional questions, is quite as good authority as my friend himself can be.

Mr. DAVY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. DAVY. Does the gentleman believe that this Government has any constitutional right to organize itself into a railroad corporation for the purpose of competing with the great railroad interests of the United States?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not think the Government could make itself into a corporation if it would.

Mr. DAVY. That is what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is the question which has troubled the minds of the most learned jurists this country ever saw, whether a county, or a State, or the Government is a corporation or not. I am sure of one thing, that the Government of the United States cannot organize itself into a corporation; it never has attempted to do so and never will. But whether it can grant corporations or corporate rights to another is another thing.

Mr. DAVY. If the Government grants these corporations, then it has a right to control them and regulate the rates of freight and of carrying passengers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This bill gives the Government that right, subject to the action of the States.

Mr. DAVY. That brings the Government into indirect competition with the railroad interests of the country.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The road, if constructed, would produce a fair competition, and so much the better for the people.

Mr. DAVY. I claim that the bill does that thing.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My friend has never read the bill. I wish he would inform himself on the question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I understand my colleague, he argues that the power of this Government is unlimited to construct roads anywhere through, in, or by a State, wherever necessary to be used as post roads. I do not intend to enter into a discussion of that question. But I desire to ask him this question. The Government also has the right to erect post-offices, to erect forts and arsenals, to build dock-yards for the uses of the Navy, to erect court-houses, &c., and to do many other things of that kind. Now, does my friend intend to say that Congress has the right to do these things without obtaining the concession of the State, the local right of jurisdiction within the States where these structures are to be placed? If not, then by analogy what right has Congress to construct a post-road without obtaining such concession?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As to the question of obtaining concession from the States, I think the practice has always been the reverse; I do not mean as to the principle, but as to the action of the Government. I think the Government of the United States has always required the States to make the concession before the Government would invest its money within the limits of the State.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Government never ventured to invest a dollar until it had first obtained the concession.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Certainly not, because it did not want its money to be placed on territory without a concession first obtained. I am as good a State-rights man as my colleague. I believe in the power of the Government to do all the things which are expressly conferred on it by the Constitution, and not otherwise. But my friend is even more liberal than this in his construction of the Constitution; he is in favor of Congress making appropriations for rivers and harbors and little inlets and creeks and bays. He will take money from the Government to open a river or inlet down in his district, and he will ask no cession from the State either. He is right in doing so; for that is within the power of the Government. I do not blame him for it. If I had harbors and bays in my district, I should be asking such aid from the Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did I understand my friend to say that I was in favor of opening docks and harbors?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I said that you asked for appropriations for harbors; at least that you favored them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir; and I maintain that this Government in its national capacity (for it is partly national and partly local in its jurisdiction and powers) has the constitutional right to afford aid to enterprises of this sort. Especially under the power of Congress to regulate commerce, it is not only its right but its duty to provide comfortable and safe ports and harbors for the accommodation of commerce.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Suppose there was a harbor in your district and that there was a town near with no post-route to it. I ask my colleague whether Congress would not have the right to make a post-road from here or any other point to get at the post-office, court-house, or other building that the Government had constitutionally erected?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not without the consent of the State of Virginia. The State possesses the right of eminent domain; and the Federal Government cannot dispose of the territory of the State without her consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I know the Government cannot dispose of the territory of a State without its consent; but I do not deem it important to discuss that question of eminent domain with my friend. Men much more learned than myself and equally learned with him have discussed the question for a century, and are no nearer an agreement now than they were at the beginning; so that I shall not undertake to discuss it or express an opinion in twenty minutes. I say to my colleague and to the House that I am as good a State-rights man as he is, as much in favor of all the reserved and inherent rights which the States have not ceded; but I will never stand here contending for rights which do not exist or which are no material benefit to the States.

Mr. SAVAGE. I now renew the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like my colleague [Mr. DOUGLAS] to have an opportunity to say a word; for he is in favor of this bill, but may be misunderstood as being opposed to it. If I have any time left I yield it to my colleague.

Mr. SAVAGE. My time is out, or I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DOUGLAS.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SAVAGE to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, there were—ayes 42, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, and Mr. DAVY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 71.

Mr. DAVY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the House will adopt the motion to reconsider. I shall then ask no further action on the bill at this time.

Mr. SAVAGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, there were—ayes 62, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, and Mr. SAVAGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 54.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not propose any action on the bill at this time; but I hope it will be permitted to remain in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This motion must be disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is discussion in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not ask to have the bill considered now.

Mr. SAVAGE. Now would it be in order, as this proceeding has been taken out of courtesy to the gentleman from Virginia—would it be in order to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now before the House is precisely that.

Mr. SAVAGE. That is the motion I wish to make, that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not necessary. The motion to reconsider having been agreed to the question now recurs on the original motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAVAGE] to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is the question now before the House: Shall the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor on that motion.

Mr. SAVAGE. For how long?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has an hour.

Mr. SAVAGE. Very well, then I will yield as much time as the gentleman from Virginia wants.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I only want five minutes.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will yield, then, for five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LORD. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to inquire whether the unfinished business can be postponed in this way? I move to proceed with the consideration of the Geneva award bill and that the further consideration of this matter be postponed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot do that at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. He cannot consider that such a privileged motion as would take the floor from me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, this is not my way of discussing the merits of a bill under consideration; but I wish simply to remove what may be a misapprehension in the minds of some gentlemen arising out of the colloquy which passed between my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] and myself the other day. Entertaining the views of the powers of this Government that I do, I could not, being also friendly to the measure, sit quietly and listen to such definitions of the powers of the States and the Federal Government, respectively, as fell from the lips of my friend and colleague. Leaving the other questions out of consideration, whether or not this company can come back to this Congress at some future day and ask for a subsidy or aid in some form or other, I wish to say the first question which addressed itself to my mind on reading the bill was that the first section undertook to invest a corporate body with powers within a State which the Government itself could not exercise directly. To remove that objection, sir, I submitted an amendment, which was adopted, declaring the corporation proposed to be created by that bill should not have any power to lay out, survey, or locate a line for its proposed road without the legislative consent of the States, respectively, in which it was proposed to build it. That amendment was adopted by the patron of the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Your amendment applied to a section which provides that "said company shall have power to construct branches and lateral roads not exceeding one hundred miles in length, except one to connect with the Northern Pacific and one with the Union Pacific Railroad, which said branches shall not be limited in their length."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by myself, while attached to and constituting a part of the first section, applies as a limitation upon every part of that bill.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Of course.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was intended to prevent the conferring upon this corporation of any power or privilege inconsistent with the local jurisdiction of the States.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. And it was so understood when it was adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Having that particular effect, that scope and meaning, I am prepared, leaving out of the discussion all other questions, without any constitutional scruples on my mind, to give my support to it when it comes up upon its passage.

Mr. MAISH. What is the amendment to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. My amendment was to the first section.

Mr. MAISH. Does it apply to the branches and lateral roads?

Mr. DOUGLAS. To all.

Mr. MAISH. Let me read the gentleman's amendment:

> But said corporation shall not have authority to lay out, survey, or locate any line for its projected road in or through any State, until said State shall by legislative enactment expressly confer the power so to do.

Mr. MAISH. The lateral roads are not projected. It does not apply to roads which are not projected, and the branches have not yet been projected.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Here is authority asked for a corporation to build a main line and branches. Are not the branches as much a part of that projected scheme as the main road? It applies to every part and parcel of that bill, which proposes to confer authority upon this company.

Mr. LEWIS. These lateral roads have not yet been projected. The bill expressly provides that the company shall have power to construct branches to connect with the Northern Pacific and Union Pacific, which shall not be limited in length. They have not yet been projected, and it cannot apply to them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no objection to gentlemen offering other amendments so far as I am concerned, but I am not the patron of the bill.

Mr. DAVY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. DAVY. As a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. There are several reasons why I am opposed to the passage of it. In the first place, when this bill was presented to the committee parties interested in it desired a subsidy. Finally there was so much opposition in the committee, they had that portion of it stricken out.

Now they are willing to ask for a charter. I ask you, for what purpose, when they know that simply granting a charter by Congress gives them no power to pass through any of the States from the Atlantic to the Mississippi River. They are then compelled to go to the individual States and obtain charters before they can make a single move in constructing the road. I ask you what was the object? For one I must frankly admit that I believe the object is to commit the Government to this railroad policy, a policy which organizes a corporation that must necessarily place itself in direct opposition to all the great railroad interests of this country. The object is to commit the Government to that policy; and if you and I live to come to the next session of Congress, we will find those very same parties that advocated a subsidy in the first place coming before the committee at the next session and advocating it. That is the object of it; and I believe, just as much as I believe I stand here speaking against this bill, that all these parties desire in procuring the passage of this bill is to commit the Government to this policy in order that they may eventually obtain a subsidy.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me a few moments?

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not rise with any intention to discuss this bill. But so far as the objection made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVY] is concerned, that at some subsequent session of Congress this railroad company may come here asking for a subsidy, that does not seem to me to be an objection to the bill. I say to the gentleman from New York, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." If any subsequent Congress may think proper to grant a subsidy to this road, I do not see that we are responsible for their action. For one, I am opposed to the subsidy. I opposed it in the committee. I shall oppose it at this session of Congress, and shall oppose it at any subsequent session of Congress. But it does not seem to me to be any argument whatever to say that at some future day this company may come to the door of Congress and ask for subsidy, and that therefore we will not give such authority as we may possess for the building of this road.

I think I can see a reason, Mr. Speaker, why this company may want a charter from Congress, if Congress has the power to grant it, and it is this: Instead of getting half a dozen different charters from as many States, through which this road is to run, having different provisions, because in some of the States the regulations are different from those in others, you have but one charter and one company authorized to construct the road, if Congress has the power to grant it, and I think it has, and this enables the company to go on and construct its road; and the only difficulty then is to obtain the right of way from the States according to the laws of the respective States. But if they have one charter and one system, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] it seems to me that is a very great advantage.

Mr. DAVY. I desire to say just one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. DAVY. I believe if we see an evil arising, it is our duty as legislators to take steps to ward it off. I believe there is an evil purpose in the attempt to procure the passage of this bill. If we can see, what I think the gentleman himself must see from the course which was pursued before the committee by these parties who came in there to advocate the subsidy, their object is sooner or later to procure a subsidy, I say it is our duty as legislators to take steps to ward that off.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will say just one word in reply, also, to what my friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] said. I think it well to avoid the first step in a matter of this kind. And as this corporation came before us in the first place asking for a subsidy, we have a right to presume their intention is in the end to obtain a subsidy. I now yield ten minutes to my friend from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to obtain from Congress a charter authorizing the construction of a narrow-gauge railroad from some point in Virginia to Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri. The bill comes somewhat unexpectedly before us, and it is not my purpose, as I have not the time allowed me, to discuss the details or merits of it. By the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAVAGE,] who has moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, I am given a few minutes in which to support his motion.

Whether there be the power on the part of the General Government to authorize the construction of a road which must invade and traverse several States in its course I cannot stop to consider. But I must express my surprise to see it asserted and maintained by that side of the House and by those who come from that section which has so often and so violently contended for State rights and against the centralization of power in the Congress of the United States.

Coming as I do from and being honored in representing a State which is traversed throughout its entire length by a road chartered by Congress, and knowing the experience of my people, I desire simply to admonish the House against any haste in again entering upon this line of legislation, a class of legislation which has been attended with more disgrace and scandal than any other. A bill of this kind should be fully considered, and if it is to pass, let it be well guarded in all its parts.

Congress in the year 1862 incorporated the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It provided for the subscription of a hundred millions of dollars. It donated to the company from the public lands ten square miles of land for every mile of road it should construct from the Missouri River westward. In addition to this, United States bonds to an amount of from $16,000 to $48,000 per mile were advanced to be secured by a first mortgage on the road. This legislation was had at the time of the nation's trouble, and Congress was moved by considerations of the highest character in making the enactment. In order to bind the distant Pacific States more securely to the rest of the Union, to facilitate the transmission of the mails, to transport troops and supplies with ease and dispatch, were among the objects which induced the giving so great a franchise and the making such liberal donations.

Any one who will read the original Pacific Railroad charter will concede that the grant made was liberal, even munificent. But a few designing individuals with no particular conception of nor sympathy with the grand objects to be effected by the building of the road, but seeing the temper of Congress, discovered an opportunity whereby they might enrich themselves. They applied in 1864 for a modification and enlargement of the charter. Their industry and zeal were too much for Congress. Where ten square miles of land were originally granted they obtained twenty; where the loan of the Government bonds was to be secured by a first mortgage it was to be made a second mortgage. Forming themselves in the double character of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Credit Mobilier Company, in the former they received the proceeds of a first mortgage on the road, some $27,000,000, the Government loan of a like sum, and some ten millions from a mortgage on their lands, all of which they put in their pockets in the name of the Credit Mobilier, besides picking up the entire road without paying the price of the stock. So the company not only get the road for nothing, but made many millions in its construction.

Annually the tax-payers throughout the United States are paying several millions of dollars to meet the interest on the bonds issued to this and other corporations chartered by Congress, and which these companies have failed and even refused to pay. Eventually the United States must pay the bonds themselves, with little or no hope of re-imbursement. Holding but a second mortgage, the security is wholly inadequate to meet the first mortgage and then pay the Government bonds with thirty years of accumulated interest.

It is true no subsidy is asked in this bill. This the framers of it have wisely omitted, in view of the present temper of the people. But the proposed measure is nevertheless insidious. The first step is to get the Government committed to establishing the road. The paternity is then fixed, and next year, or at some suitable time, the fostering care of the Government will be challenged. The nation's credit or bounty will be demanded in its aid, and those appliances which reflect no credit upon legislation, and which industrious, shrewd corporators and their paid attorneys have learned to apply, will be brought to bear.

It will not do to say that we need not anticipate these questions, and that Congress will be able to deal with them properly when they shall arise. It is best to guard the first step. No one can vouch for the virtue of future Congresses, whatever may be his opinion of the present or those of the past.

But one of the principal objections against a charter of this kind emanating from the General Government is the freedom of the corporation from local control. The experience of the people of Nebraska illustrates the inconvenience and damage which grow out of it. The Union Pacific Railroad, as I have remarked, runs the entire length of the State. The dealings and relations between the people there and the company are of necessity extensive and intimate. Still, as the company derives its charter from Congress, it may fix any terms and inflict any imposition upon the people without power on the part of the latter through the Legislature of the State to effect escape or redress. At one time it charged as high as ten cents per mile for passenger fare; a rate unheard of elsewhere, I believe. Freights are charged proportionately.

Then the company, among the donations of land it has received, has held something like five millions of acres in my State alone. By a construction of its charter and under the holdings of the United States courts the company, while it holds them for sale, while they are enhanced in value by the toil, money, and enterprise of the settlers about them, these lands have for the most part been exempted from taxation. The burdens of taxation have thus been shifted from those most able to pay and imposed on those who can illy afford to meet them. Intent, seemingly, on getting all it can, and unwilling to meet any of the expense incident to government, the company even defied the State in its attempt to levy taxes on its road or rolling-stock. Because it received its charter from the General Government and was carrying mail, troops, and munitions, like any other road, it yet arrogated to itself governmental protection and treated the State's effort to collect tax from it, as from other roads in the State, as impertinent. Fortunately, however, after the expenditure of much money in costs and counsel fees, a decision from a divided court was obtained in favor of the State. But in any attempt to obtain legal redress from the company the party seeking it must submit to following it into the United States court or abandon the claim, special legislation having been obtained through Congress giving the company immunity from having matters concerning it tried in local courts.

In all these matters, I repeat, this company is removed from and is superior to local jurisdiction and control. The difficulty of obtaining relief here is great, as my experience proves. What particularly concerns Nebraska may not interest members from other States. I have introduced bills here at different sessions looking to relief, and have pressed them as vigorously as I knew how and as some of the committees will attest. But I get scarcely any through, and those fail at the other end of the Capitol. Among these I have before this body a bill to regulate the tolls over the company's bridge over the Missouri River at Omaha. By the amended charter the company should have built this bridge as a part of its road, so as to connect with the roads from the East ending at the bank of the Missouri River, thus carrying out the design of Congress to create an unbroken line across the continent. However, when the company claimed to have finished its road in 1869, and received its pay in full, it had omitted this bridge. Having learned the way of making large gain in the construction of roads, it came here in 1871 and obtained permission to issue bridge bonds to the extent of two and a half million dollars to aid in the construction of a bridge. Since its construction they have charged not only the other seven or eight roads which center there, but for their own cars the sum of $10 per car of freight and fifty cents for each passenger crossing the bridge.

This rate must strike every one except the owners of the bridge as extortionate. To the people I immediately represent it proves very onerous. Raising corn, wheat, and like coarse products, dependent largely for their value upon the rate of transportation, they must submit to this extraordinary exaction to pass these articles barely beyond the threshold of the State.

This, a matter of vital concern to a people whose fuel, whose lumber, salt, and the like must pay such high tariff, does not particularly concern members who may never see Nebraska, and whose constituents are indifferent to the rates of tolls charged. The contest here is therefore not an easy one with a corporation with millions to make or lose, and which can and does employ the ablest counsel of the land and expert agents to protect its interest. Before some of the committees of the House I have met the ablest counsel of the land, gentlemen of national repute, while in the corridors and lobby, some no doubt now listening to what I say, I am pointed to "agents" or lobbyists employed at good prices by one and another of these companies to "reason" with members and protect the companies' interest.

But I trust to get some one or more of the measures I refer to before this body at some time, and I expect they will challenge and receive the consideration to which they are entitled. Here is the place for redress. The State is powerless, and unless abuses are corrected here, the people of my State and those similarly affected are remediless.

But I have consumed the time given me. I hope the bill will be recommitted, that it may be fully discussed and considered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman does not pretend there is a lobby in connection with this bill?

Mr. CROUNSE. No, sir; I am simply giving my experience, and wish to warn gentlemen not to be too ready to put themselves under the power of corporations or their lobbies.

Mr. SAVAGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is one kind of a bill which I would like to see reported from the committee, for I would be glad to support it, and if this bill is recommitted I hope the committee will have regard to those principles upon which we should legislate. First, we want a charter giving Congress jurisdiction where the subject is beyond the power of State control. We want the right of the State protected in regard to local shipments. The difficulty under which we labor at present is that the railroads bringing our products from the West to the seaboard are controlled by the State law alone. It is not the interest of men who control the present through lines of railroad that any new charter shall be given; and those of us who live in the Mississippi Valley must expect to have their combined efforts against any relief to us in that direction. It is not the political belief of gentlemen coming from most of the democratic States that Congress should give a national charter. Consequently, those interests are combined to prevent any such charters being given.

We have this matter brought directly before us in the West. The evils have been twofold: The want of law to protect men who have invested their money in these railroads; and the want of law to protect those who patronize the roads. The halt that has been called to the building of railroads has been in consequence, first, of the extortion practiced upon the shippers, and, secondly, from the fact that the men who bought the bonds by the aid of which those roads were built have had no protection whatever. We want the committee who have charge of this matter to report a bill that shall give to Congress the right to control shipments of an interstate character. We want them also to reserve to the States the right to control the local shipments within the States. If these points are covered, then I should be glad to vote for such a bill. I do not want to sacrifice the rights either of the States or of the United States; and I desire that the General Government, the only power in the land that is able to reach this evil, shall step in and correct it.

Mr. SAVAGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee that reported this bill, I desire that no misunderstanding shall exist in regard to the action or the opinions of that committee. In the first place, I admit that this bill originally asked for a subsidy; but the Committee on Railways and Canals, at their very first meeting, decided unanimously to report for the consideration of the House no bill asking a subsidy. That action was in conformity with the resolution adopted by this House in the first few days of this session, and in conformity also with the individual judgment of the members of the committee. I desire to say furthermore that the president of this railroad company came himself to the committee and desired that the provision for a subsidy should be struck out. This much should be stated in justice to him.

I am very much surprised to hear gentlemen get up here and oppose an enterprise of this sort upon the idea that it interferes with State rights, and that if Congress should merely recognize this corporation as existing under State authority, there is great danger that at the next session or some time hereafter we may go on and grant great subsidies to this corporation or other corporations.

Why, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVY] is very tenacious upon this subject. After the Congress of the United States has given $200,000,000 of subsidies to northern enterprises, he is opposed to action of Congress even recognizing without any subsidy the existence of a corporation of this sort—a corporation originating in a Southern State. Why, sir, suppose that the president and corporators of this company may hereafter ask for a subsidy, cannot the gentleman leave that question to be decided in the future by Congress in its discretion, courage, and ability? Here is a railroad proposed to run through West Virginia, to open up a mountainous region which has no facilities at all in the way of railroads, and if you appeal to the States of West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois upon this subject, I presume there will not be a dissenting voice against allowing the Government to assume jurisdiction to the extent that is asked in this bill, simply to recognize the corporation and give it countenance and support.

Gentlemen on this floor, especially from the South, are too much alarmed about subsidies. The gentleman behind me [Mr. ATKINS] asks me whether the constitutional power is denied. I do believe that some of our would-be extreme State-rights men would now deny that the Government of the United States has the right to establish a post-office or a post-road within a State without the consent of the State, though the power of the Government in that respect is unlimited and unqualified. Why, sir, what is the difference between cleaning out a river in a State and running a railroad through a State? How many State-rights men on this floor have voted for appropriations of thousands of dollars by the United States Government to clean out little rivers in their States and even to make rivers where hardly any water runs?

Now, I beg gentlemen not to be too much frightened about subsidies. Mr. Speaker, I profess, and so do my brethren on this floor from the South who advocate railroads, to be as much devoted to State rights as any members here; but I give fair notice that we intend before this Congress expires, and in the next Congress if any of us should be here, to ask for a subsidy from the General Government to build a railroad through the South.

I do not propose to support with hearty acclaim a Government that will expend $200,000,000 of its money to build great railroads, to build up one section of the country to the exclusion of the rights of another section. While I think this power should be guarded with extreme caution, yet I intend to vote as a southern man, as a Union man, as a man who advocates the equality of the States in the Union—I intend to vote for every subsidy for the general benefit where we want these improvements in the South which pays its just proportion of taxes to the Government and which is entitled to an equal distribution of its benefits.

Mr. DAVY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have not time in the few minutes granted to me by the gentleman from Ohio to yield for any question.

Mr. DAVY. But I wish to ask one question, and the gentleman from Ohio will yield for that purpose. Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that he is in favor of a subsidy?

Mr. SAVAGE. Yes; he said he would vote for all subsidies.

Mr. DAVY. And for all roads.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. No, there is no subsidy in this bill. I said the time is not far distant when I would be in favor of granting a subsidy from the General Government to a great and important railroad enterprise or to public improvements in the South upon the ground that the North has already had $200,000,000 of the public money for its improvement, while the South has had comparatively nothing. I want equality in this regard between the States.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no bill before this House or before Congress asking a subsidy for this railroad.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not yield any further, and am opposed to this discussion, and hope it will soon be brought to a close.

But it seems to be necessary that I should say a word or two in reply to what fell from my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES.] How much time, Mr. Speaker, have I left of my hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty minutes.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do know that I have any objection to the gentleman from Kentucky voting for any subsidy he feels disposed to vote for, but I did not expect to precipitate a discussion of how many other railroads this country would be called upon to build or anything of the kind. So far as this particular measure is concerned I do not know to whom the gentleman from Kentucky alludes in the discussion as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As no gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a speech in opposition to this bill so far, I am at a loss to know to whom he refers. My friend from New York [Mr. DAVY] is the only one I know of on the opposite side who has made a speech against this bill connected with the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I said the gentleman from Pennsylvania by inadvertence. I meant the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JENKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes.

Mr. JENKS. Mr. Speaker, the question as to a northern, southern, eastern, or western railroad is in no way pertinent to this consideration. The same equal justice should be done of course and will be done, I apprehend, by Congress to all parts of the country. But the principle involved in this bill is utterly destructive of everything we have heretofore adopted as the principles upon which this Government should be administered.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, observe the character of the charter. There is a Virginia charter granted to a road. They come to Congress, and now ask the provisions of that charter shall be extended over half a dozen different States, with power to make two branches of indefinite length from the western end, probably, which may terminate one at San Francisco, and the other possibly at Portland, Oregon. Then, without designating the points from which and to which the different lateral branches are to run, the right is granted to make lateral branches one hundred miles in length. If we were in a State, and asking the State to charter such a road as this, it would be met at once as being so objectionable that it should not pass.

The people should hold fast to these franchises, for when they are granted they assume a magnitude the people cannot any longer control.

But what character has this road? It has the double character of a charter from the State and a charter from the National Government. Who shall assume control over these charters? Will they come under the law of the State or the law of the National Government, or under both; or should there be a constant collision between the two?

It is a complete mongrel so far as this bill is concerned. And even if it were proper and right that the National Government should grant a charter in the first instance, it certainly would not be right to adopt the charter granted by the State of Virginia and extend its provisions over half a dozen different States. It is equivalent to saying, "Let Virginia pass an act by which she shall charter a road not only in her own territory, but which shall be extended to the State of Pennsylvania, or wherever else she may deem proper."

So its mongrel character is the first objection to the bill. Then the character of the bill itself is different from that ever granted, in that the road has indefinite power to make lateral branches wherever it shall deem proper and to two branches of indefinite length.

But the duties of the United States Government are so great, that even if it has full power to grant such a charter, it should not be exercised. If the power exists it should not be exercised, in that it will cast upon the Government a burden of duties which never can be properly discharged. If this road may ask a charter from the National Government any other may. And if the National Government grants charters to railroads through all the different parts of the United States, Congress can do no other business than legislate on railroads alone. In order to discharge that duty it would have to throw aside all other governmental duties.

But there is another view I desire briefly to present. When this road is chartered by virtue of an act of Congress, then any infringement of the charter or any action against the company draws the litigants into the courts of the United States. Now, every principle of justice requires that justice should be administered at home. Every man feels more confident of obtaining right and justice where he is nearest his own home. This thought or intention has pervaded all the institutions of our country. Now, suppose this railroad company, proposing to be chartered, should get involved in litigation with some citizen, say of Illinois, as to the right of way, they will go through the courts of Illinois, and the courts of Illinois might decide as the company might think contrary to law. The consequence would be that the litigation would be finally brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus every man who has a right of way to settle with a railroad company would be involved in litigation in the courts of the United States by virtue of this congressional action.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JENKS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is the gentleman aware that this bill provides that this company cannot drive a stake or send an engineer into any State without the consent of the Legislature of that State?

Mr. JENKS. I am aware of that; but when it is chartered by Congress there is congressional legislation which requires interpretation and application, and whenever a law of Congress is to be interpreted as a matter of right, the citizen may go into the courts of the United States to determine that controversy. Every citizen who had litigation with this railroad might ultimately have to terminate his case in the Supreme Court of the United States, and this being a mighty corporation, as a general rule any one would rather forego his right than attempt to assert it. And if Government is framed for the interestis of the people, this is a state of things which ought not to exist.

They base the right of Congress to charter this road on its constitutional right to establish post-offices and post-roads. If that be a correct interpretation of the Constitution, then the Government of the United States is authorized to make all the public roads in the United States. Because if every public road may be made a post-road, if that is the intention, then the whole road system of the United States would be concentrated and brought within the power of the Government of the United States. So that we would have these principles adopted: First, that the United States may charter all the railroads in the United States; second, that she may charter or may regulate all the roads; third, that she may draw the litigation of all her citizens into the United States courts. And these are violations of the fundamental principles on which our Government stands, and should be resisted by every one who has the good of his country at heart.

Therefore I think this bill ought by no means to be allowed to pass. Reference has been made to subsidies. It is not in this bill, and I hope it never will be in any bill. But whether it is or not, there is here a subsidy principle more dangerous than any money subsidy that could have been introduced into the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.]

Mr. HEREFORD. In my strict construction of the Constitution I yield to no gentleman upon this floor. But without going into the argument upon that question, (for that would take more time than is allowed me,) I want to ask my democratic friends on this floor who say they are opposed to this bill on principle, are you better democrats than the father of the Constitution? James Madison, when President of the United States, signed the great Cumberland road bill. He saw then no constitutional trouble when he came to investigate the question of signing the great Cumberland road bill in the fact that it passed from State to State. Where is the difference in principle?

We have sat at the feet of Madison, all of us, in our younger and in our older days, and have learned from him what was the true interpretation of this instrument. And, without going over the argument that he made when he signed that bill and upon many other occasions, I say that the example he set us and that the principle he enunciated when he signed that very bill are sufficient guarantee to me that Congress has ample power—to do what? To simply grant a charter to a railroad. It is true it passes through different States; but, as the bill itself provides, this charter is entirely inoperative, and can be stopped at any State line in two ways: First, before you can enter the domain of a sovereign State this bill provides that you must get the consent of that State. It provides by another amendment that any State by a mere resolution can stop it. I ask the strictest constructionist of the Constitution where there is any violation of the Constitution, where is the danger to any State?

There is another reason that induces me to support this bill. Ever since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, session after session we have heard the subject of cheap transportation urged upon each and every member of this House. This proposed charter is, to my mind, a solution of the whole question.

I do not say that any of my friends who have spoken adversely to this proposition are in the interest of the great railroads, for I never yet have impugned the motives of any gentleman upon this floor. But, while I do not charge them with that, and I do not believe that it is so, yet their conduct, their speeches, their votes here to-day are in the interest of the great railroad monopolies of the United States.

This question was presented before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, by a resolution of this House, directing us to inquire into the combinations made by the various railroads and the discriminations against the commerce of the United States by the various railroads in the Union. That resolution passed by this House is the voice of the House, of the republicans as well as of the democrats. It declares that discriminations by these combinations do exist, and that such discriminations cripple commerce and paralyze all the interests of this great country.

Now if you charter this railroad and it is built, it is a solution of the whole question of cheap transportation. In the investigation of that subject by the Committee on Commerce we asked the question, as to these discriminations and combinations, if the roads charged A more than they did B for the same kind of work. The vice-president of the great Pennsylvania Railroad, from which State my friend [Mr. JENKS] hails, declined to answer that question, and put it upon the ground that, while the Pennsylvania Railroad Company owns and controls six thousand miles of railway, yet they are chartered by the different States through which they run; they are operating under State charters, and therefore Congress has no right to investigate the subject.

Now charter this railroad, and then it will come clearly within the power of Congress to investigate that subject. Charter this railroad, build it, and it will come in competition with the great railroad monopoly of the day, and we will have cheap transportation.

Mr. SAVAGE. In rising to close this debate, I desire to consume only a few minutes of the time of the House. But some statements have been made here by my friend from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] to which I think it proper to allude. So far at least as I am myself concerned, I do not propose to be charged with having, or even to have it supposed that I have, any interest in any railroad in the country, or that I am in opposition to any measure which in the least would have a tendency to cheapen transportation, which my people are so anxious to have done.

There may be a very grave difference of opinion between the gentleman from West Virginia and myself as to the effect this road will have upon cheapening the transportation of the country. I am one of those who do not believe that cheap transportation can be brought about by destroying all the powers of the State Legislatures of this country to legislate upon the rates of freight and transportation. I am not one of those who believe that it has the effect to cheapen transportation where a railroad may discriminate against citizens of the county or district which I represent, and we can get no remedy except by making an appeal to Congress, which represents thirty-seven States. I am not one of those who believe in taking away from the Legislature of the State of Ohio, for instance, the right to say that this railroad company cannot discriminate against towns, cities, and villages that are not on roads other than the one this bill proposed to charter.

I am not one of those who believe that such a road as this can be established in the State of Ohio and we can say to the Legislature of that State, no matter how much this road may discriminate against your citizens or attempt to crush the industries of your section by high rates of fare and transportation, you shall not have the right to regulate the rates of fare and transportation and put them upon a different footing from what this road may choose to put them, unless Congress shall come to your aid.

This bill places in the hands of Congress exclusively the power to legislate in regard to the rates of transportation, and expressly denies the right of any State to legislate upon the subject, or it does so by implication at least, by providing that Congress alone shall legislate upon the subject. No State Legislature has any right on this matter. The Legislature of the State of Ohio is denied the power to protect the interests of her people by legislation, as absolutely under this bill as if the Legislature was entirely abolished. This bill might very properly be entitled, a bill to abolish State Legislatures, so far as this railroad is concerned, in those States through which it is proposed to construct it.

Entertaining these views, I could not support this bill in its present shape. I have moved that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that there may be an opportunity to consider and amend it in these particulars. If there must be a charter, leaving out the whole question of subsidies, let us amend this bill and endeavor to make it somewhat near what it should be.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman says he does not want to concede the right of this corporation to go through his State, and that he wants his State to have the power to regulate the local rates of freight and transportation. Does not the gentleman know that this bill now provides that this road shall not be constructed through any State without the consent of that State?

Mr. SAVAGE. I will answer that question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. And does not the gentleman know that the State when it is called on to give its consent can attach any condition it pleases, and if the road accepts those conditions are binding upon the company? And in that way the State will have the right to regulate the freights passing through the State; and therefore the States have it in their power to regulate freights passing through their territory.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not understand the last part of the question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The bill says the road must be approved by the State before it can pass through its territory. The States can make a conditional approval, dependent upon the road carrying freights at certain rates.

Mr. SAVAGE. Let me answer the question which the gentleman is now expanding into argument. I deny that there is any such provision in the bill or in the amendments. I take the ground that the State Legislatures must either accept in toto or reject in toto this charter. I go further and say that by this bill the Legislatures of the States through which this road passes have no power whatever to legislate so far as any question of freight or transportation may arise locally or otherwise.

Mr. DAVY. The right is reserved in the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. The bill reserves the right of Congress to legislate on the subject with the condition to which I referred in my opening remarks; that the laws regulating the question must apply without exception to all the chartered railroad corporations of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. SAVAGE. It does not make any difference what your legislation in reference to railroads may have been in the past, it is continued by this bill for all time to come; and neither the Congress of the United States nor the State Legislatures can legislate on this subject except in such a way as to apply eqally to all railroads in the country.

I now ask a vote on the motion to recommit.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentleman's motion will be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable. On this question, as the Chair understands, the gentleman from Ohio calls for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole, there were—ayes 69, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAVAGE, and Mr. JONES of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEES ON DISTRICT BILLS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. BUCKNER, Mr. STEVENSON, and Mr. HENDEE as the committee of conference on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also announced the appointment of Mr. NEAL, Mr. HARTRIDGE, and Mr. WILLARD as the committee of conference on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. No. 2676) for the assessment and collection of taxes in the District of Columbia.

EDWARD CORSELIUS AND OTHERS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3806) for the relief of Edward Corselius, Colby Short, James W. Jubb, Sylvanus Avery, J. J. Hosmer, George Hopkins, W. M. Wright, W. E. Clark, G. W. Cramton, M. McDermott, and E. Allen, late members of the Michigan Veteran Volunteer Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the Army appropriation bill, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. THURMAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Several members called for the regular order.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PIERCE. I am disinclined to occupy the time of the House, and I should not do so if the question under consideration was not of grave importance, involving as I believe the honor and good faith of the Government. As I have but a few minutes in which to present my views, I shall not undertake to review or criticise the arguments made by the majority and minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, but confine myself to a brief statement of the circumstances under which the award was made and the principles which should govern its distribution.

The sum of $15,500,000 in gold was awarded by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva in compensation for all direct damages inflicted by the confederate cruisers known as the Alabama, the Florida, the Shenandoah, and their tenders, the Tuscaloosa, the Tacony, the Clarence, and the Archer. In the case of the Shenandoah it was decided that Great Britain was responsible only for the acts committed by that vessel after her departure from Melbourne on the 18th of February, 1865, and compensation was allowed accordingly. The award in the case of the other two vessels covered their whole career under the confederate flag. So far as related to the damages inflicted by the vessels called the Retribution, the Georgia, the Sumter, the Nashville, the Tallahassee, and the Chickamauga, the tribunal decided that Great Britain had not failed, by any act or omission, to fulfill its duties as defined by the treaty of Washington; and, so far as related to the vessels called the Sallie, the Jefferson Davis, the Music, the Boston, and the V. H. Joy, it was decided that they ought to be excluded from consideration for want of evidence.

The claims made by the United States commissioners for compensation on account of expenses incurred by the Government in the pursuit of these cruisers, the loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payments of insurance, and the prolongation of the war were distinctly and definitely disallowed.

In order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages sustained by the inculpated cruisers, the arbitrators disallowed all double claims for the same losses and all claims for gross freights so far as they exceeded net freights. The protocols of the conferences at Geneva show very clearly how the final award was arrived at. The amount of the American claim for ninety-four ships and cargoes destroyed by these cruisers, for whose acts Great Britain was, by the tribunal, held responsible, amounted to $14,437,000. These same claims as revised by the British commissioners amounted to $7,074,000. The mean value was then taken, one year's wages were allowed to the crews of fishing-craft and whalers in lieu of prospective catch, 25 per cent. added on the values of vessels, interest was allowed at 6 per cent., and the sum arrived at was $15,409,289.69—and thereupon the round sum of fifteen and a half millions was awarded.

By chapter 459 of the acts of the Forty-third Congress (1874) a court of commissioners was established with power to adjudicate and allow claims for direct damages caused by the inculpated cruisers in those cases in which the claimants had not received full indemnity from the insurance companies for property destroyed; but no claims of insurance companies for destruction of property by the inculpated cruisers were admissible, unless the sums of their losses exceeded the sum of all their premiums or other gains upon or in respect to war risks. This act was the work of a conference committee appointed to harmonize the differences between the two branches of Congress. It covered only those claims about the validity of which there was no dispute. In reply to a question, the chairman of the committee on the part of the House, who reported the bill, said he believed the amount of money it would require to pay the claims provided for by the bill would not exceed three millions. It was also stated by the chairman that, in respect of claims by the insurance companies, by the war-premium men, and by those who lost by cruisers other than those named in the award, the matter was left wholly to future legislation. Unless there had been a distinct understanding that the rights of these claimants should not be prejudiced by this partial provision for distribution, it is evident from an examination of the record that it never could have been adopted.

The court of commissioners appointed under the act of the Forty-third Congress had awarded, up to the 1st of April, the sum of $8,078,033.59. To cover the awards yet to be made under this act it is estimated that $700,000 will be required. Under the act of the present Congress extending the time for claimants, it is estimated that the awards will amount to $300,000. It appears from this that the total of all claims under existing laws will amount in round numbers to about $9,300,000.

The sum received from Great Britain, having been invested in United States 5 per cent. bonds, now amounts to something over $20,000,000 in currency. If we deduct from this the amount already awarded and the estimated amount to be awarded, we have the sum of $11,000,000 awaiting distribution.

Now, then, to whom does this money belong? The majority of the committee say that those who had property destroyed on the high seas by the exculpated cruisers (i. e., the cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was not held responsible) shall receive the first consideration; that those who paid enhanced rates of insurance shall next be considered; and that the insurance companies, which paid for property destroyed both by the inculpated and the exculpated cruisers, shall receive their compensation from what there is left, if anything.

The following statement shows the claims already filed under these several classes named in the bill:

Statement of amount of claims for losses by the so-called exculpated cruisers—from revised list of claims.

Boston	$400 00
Chickamauga	183,070 00
Georgia	431,160 00
Jefferson Davis	7,752 00
Nashville	108,433 95
Retribution	29,018 52
Sallie	5,540 00
Sumter	179,697 07
Tallahassee	836,841 82
Shenandoah, ante Melbourne	554,810 49
Total	2,336,725 19

Of this there are claimed by the insurance companies for losses by the—

Boston	$400 00
Chickamauga	115,509 00
Georgia	166,900 00
Jefferson Davis	4,752 00
Nashville	16,050 00
Retribution	10,852 00
Sallie	5,540 00
Tallahassee	205,633 68
Shenandoah	142,677 00
Total	668,313 68

Leaving the total amount claimed by other parties $1,668,411.51

The claims for war premiums have amounted to $6,328,869.77, namely, three hundred and forty-one claims filed before May 15, 1872, (from revised list,) $6,146,219.71; sixteen claims filed after that date, (Miscellaneous Document No. 270, House of Representatives, first session, Forty-third Congress,) $182,650.06.

The total claims by insurance companies for losses by inculpated cruisers amount to (including four years' interest at 4 per cent.) $5,644,365.12.

It appears, then, that the total claims in each class provided for in the bill submitted by the majority are as follows:

First class	$1,668,411 51
Interest	266,945 84
Total		$1,935,357 35
Second class	6,328,869 77
Interest	1,012,619 16
Total		7,341,488 93
Third class	5,534,145 30
Interest	885,463 22
Total		6,419,608 52
Total of three classes		15,696,454 80

It appears from this statement that, supposing no additional claims were filed, the amount left after satisfying the first two classes would be about $1,700,000 to meet claims for actual losses on the part of the insurance companies, which were covered by the Geneva award, amounting to $5,644,365.12.

Now, although the finding of the tribunal was for the gross amount of damages inflicted by the inculpated cruisers, the Government is not relieved thereby from its obligations as the receiver in trust to distribute the money in accordance with the principles of law which obtain in every civilized community.

In a recent opinion pronounced by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, (West vs. United States, No. 91, page 12,) the following language is used:

Do not national courtesy and good faith require of us to suppose that Congress, in creating this court, never intended we should distribute this fund other than for the purposes for which Great Britain supposed she was paying it? For instance, suppose Congress had chosen to keep half the fund and convert it into the Treasury of the nation, or had directed this court to distribute it among those whose commercial interests had been injured by the terror and alarm caused by the insurgent cruisers, or among those who had suffered loss by the depredations of rebel cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah. In such cases, would not Great Britain have had cause to complain that she had been misled, overreached, deceived? Would our Government have been acting in good faith in making such disposition of this fund?

Mr. LORD. Did not the decision to which the gentleman refers announce distinctly that Congress could dispose of this fund in its discretion?

Mr. PIERCE. I did not so understand it. I only know that they say distinctly that if Congress should give the fund to any parties except those who lost by these three cruisers (and your bill gives it to other parties) Great Britain would have the right to claim that she had been deceived, misled, overreached. It is for that reason I oppose this bill.

The claimants to whom the first preference is given by the majority bill, namely, those who sustained losses by the exculpated cruisers, have no more right to a share in the distribution of this fund than they would if they had had property destroyed by the confederate gunboats on the Mississippi and other rivers. The United States, acting in their behalf, presented the claims and the evidence to the court of arbitration, and they were, as I have already shown, passed upon and disallowed. Said Judge Poland in discussing the question before this House in 1874:

Why may not gentlemen in Pennsylvania come in with claims for houses destroyed in Pennsylvania when that State was invaded by the rebels, and be paid out of the award just as well as any vessel-owner who claims compensation for his vessel for which we have received no money under the award?

As to the second class of claims allowed under the bill, namely, those for enhanced rates of insurance, I will show briefly from the record of proceedings at Geneva how they were regarded. Mr. Davis, the agent of the United States, claimed that under the treaty this Government was entitled to have the judgment of the tribunal upon all their claims, both direct and indirect, growing out of the acts of the cruisers. He says in his report to Mr. Fish, (volume 4, page 2:)

The claims for enhanced rates of insurance were among those which had been classified as indirect in the statement which had received the approval of all the members of the joint high commission.

To the submission of these indirect claims for the action of the tribunal Great Britain, as is well known, took exception on the ground that they were not within the scope of the treaty of Washington; and for a time the treaty was in danger of being overthrown. To prevent such a calamity the arbitrators, on their own motion, decided—

That, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations.

That decision was accepted by the United States; and the Secretary of State, in communicating to Mr. Davis the assent of the Government to the action of the tribunal, said:

This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character. The President, therefore, * * * authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he had felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion; and that, in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion as adjudicated and disposed of; and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.

It appears, therefore, that these claims for enhanced rates of insurance stood on the same footing as the claims for damages on account of the prolongation of the war.

Now, in regard to the insurance companies whose claims under this bill are to be paid out of what is left, if anything, after the other claimants are satisfied, I think I can show, in a very few words, that they are the only parties named in the majority bill who have a valid claim upon this fund, and their claim does not extend beyond the losses on account of the inculpated cruisers. The award was made in compensation for property destroyed by the three confederate cruisers and their tenders, i. e., for ninety-four ships and cargoes. Who were the owners of that property? The act passed in 1874 provided for the payment of those who had not their property insured. The right of the insurer to all claims of the assured, upon payment of the amount insured, has been decided by all the State and Federal courts. It is not a technical right but a natural one.

Judge Story decided in Vasse's case, 1 Peters, 193, where the Spanish government paid the United States a sum of money awarded by commissioners in compensation for vessels seized and carried into Spanish ports—a case in many respects like the one under consideration—that the money belonged to the insurer. He said:

The law gives to the act of abandonment to underwriters, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would. The underwriter then stands in the place of the assured and becomes legally entitled to all that can be recovered from destruction. It is clear that the right to compensation for damages and injuries to which citizens of the United States were entitled, and which under the treaty with Spain were to be subjects of compensation, passed by abandonment to the underwriters upon property which had been seized or captured.

In a speech on the French claims delivered in the United States Senate in 1835 Daniel Webster said:

> There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized world than that an underwriter who has paid a loss on ships or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment, and if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter.

In the British counter case at Geneva it is stated that—

> The American insurance companies who have paid the owners as for a total loss are in our opinion—

That is, of British counsel—> entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter, according to the well-known principle that an underwriter who has paid as for a total loss acquires the rights of the assured in respect of the subject-matter of insurance.

And in this connection I may be permitted to state that I have the word of one of the arbitrators at Geneva that the claims of the underwriters formed the basis of the award paid to this Government by Great Britain, and that the records of the court clearly show that fact.

"But" it is said "the insurance companies made money out of their business during the war, and therefore they are not entitled to any consideration in the distribution of this award." Did we take into account the profit and loss on their general business during the war of those whose claims have been adjudicated under the provisions of the act of the last Congress? Do those who favor the payment of war premiums propose to examine the accounts of the claimants for re-imbursement and ascertain whether they made a profit or sustained a loss on their general business during the war, and if they made a profit rule them out, and if there was a loss to re-imburse them only to the extent of that loss? I suspect that if such an examination was made we should find very few war-premium claimants who would be entitled to share in the award. It would be found that the enhanced prices which they had received for freights and cargoes had generally been more than sufficient to cover the enhanced rates of insurance. There is no reason, therefore, in making any such unjust discrimination against the claims of the underwriters. Many of the companies which prospered on their general business during the war have since met with reverses and have been obliged to suspend for want of sufficient assets to cover their losses.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding this brief and necessarily imperfect presentation of the question, I cannot help saying that the delay in providing for the distribution of this award to the parties to whom it belongs, and the propositions which have been submitted for its distribution to parties to whom it clearly does not belong, have justly brought reproach upon the Government. That the Government is in the position of a trustee, bound to distribute this money to those on whose account the award was made, seems to me unquestionable. Said Mr. Chief Justice Kent in the case of Gracie vs. The New York Insurance Company:

> If France should, at any future period, agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would in the first instance be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the re-imbursement, and this would clearly be the defendants, (the underwriters,) if they should pay the amount.

Upon the decision of this question there is involved a matter of graver concern than the withholding from the rightful claimants that to which, by the laws of every civilized community, they are justly entitled. If the terms of this award, made in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, are to be disregarded—if they are to be violated in the manner here proposed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House—the era of peaceful arbitration between sovereign powers which was supposed to have been inaugurated by that treaty will end with that treaty. That is a consideration which I beg you in the interests of peace, in the interests of human progress, to bear in mind, and to weigh carefully in the determination of this important question.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the post-office appropriation bill have had several meetings and have failed to agree. I am accordingly directed to report to the House. I move the committee be discharged, and that a further conference be asked on the disagreement of the two Houses. Let the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.
> W. S. HOLMAN,
> J. H. BLOUNT,
> HENRY WALDRON,
> Managers on the part of the House.
> J. R. WEST,
> H. HAMLIN,
> Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the committee be discharged and that the House ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes.

Mr. SEELYE. I think we are entitled, Mr. Speaker, to a more specific statement of the ground of the disagreement. I take it it is very clear this agreement can only be gained by concessions on both sides. It seems to me this House is entitled to know whether the committee of conference have made concessions which are judicious.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course the gentleman from Massachusetts is aware that the details of what transpires in the committee-room as between conferees are not proper to state.

Mr. SEELYE. I understand that, of course.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can state the leading points of difference between the conferences of the two Houses. They are, first, in reference to salaries of postmasters; secondly, to reduction of the cost of transportation of the mails by railroads; and thirdly, to third-class matter. These are the three leading points of difference between the two Houses.

Mr. SEELYE. My special inquiry is whether the committee of conference has manifested a disposition to make becoming concessions. I take it this House is not going before the country to insist upon its own way in the matter of disagreement between it and the Senate. We must have concessions made from both sides. I think we are entitled to know whether the committee of conference on the part of the House has manifested a becoming disposition in reference to those concessions, and to know that would require us to know how far in concessions they have been willing to go.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts can see how impossible it is to state to what extent concessions were made either by the conferees on the part of the Senate or the conferees on the part of the House. The gentleman will remember there are a great many amendments made to this bill. Indeed, there are several millions of dollars' difference between the two Houses in reference to the amount to be appropriated. The points of difference are on the principle at which salaries are to be adjusted, the compensation to be allowed to railroad companies for transporting the mails, and in reference to third-class matter. When I mention those as the points of difference I think I indicate somewhat that there have been concessions either upon the part of the conferees of the House or upon the part of the conferees of the Senate.

But I will say, in a general way, inasmuch as this is an important bill and ought to become a law at the very earliest moment, that none of the conferees appointed by the House, and I assume none appointed by the Senate, would fail to agree to all just and reasonable concessions to secure the prompt passage of such a bill. I indulge the hope that this measure will receive favorable consideration at an early moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is that the committee be discharged and that the House ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. That is not the regular course, but at this late period of the session it may be considered as the proper one.

Mr. BANKS. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana, who represents the committee of conference on the part of the House, if in his judgment there is any probability of an agreement in case the House discharges this committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. I feel entirely satisfied that the House should ask a further conference on this bill. I can only state so much. It is impossible for any person to fortell what may be the action of the Senate. I will assume, and the gentleman from Massachusetts will see I do assume it to be inevitable, that the two Houses will come together on such a bill. But I cannot enter into the details of what transpired in the committeee-room in conference between the two bodies. I can only state, as the gentleman will see, the real points of difference are the three I have mentioned.

Mr. BANKS. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, we are acting without any information whatever, without knowing anything of the facts on the question submitted to the House involved in the meeting of this conference committee. A conference committee is different from the ordinary committees of the House to which we refer bills, and where we never allow what has transpired in committee to be stated in the House. In the meeting of the conference of both Houses on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses the members of the House have the right to attend if they desire. And it has not been infrequent that reports from the managers of the conference on the part of the one House or the other have been made of the exact conditions of the questions submitted to the committee of conference with the view of obtaining instruction. Now we have a right to know if in the judgment of the gentlemen who compose this committee of conference there be a chance of a conclusion being arrived at if we shall agree to the additional conference they desire; so that, if there is no chance of agreement, the House may take another course.

Mr. HOLMAN. We should not have asked another conference if we had not indulged the hope that a further conference on this bill would result in a conclusion being arrived at.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a very plain matter. The gentlemen that now compose the committee of conference between the two Houses cannot agree, and therefore another conference is desirable, that it may be seen whether other gentlemen on such a conference can agree.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that is the universal course, I believe.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see that as he states the question we may be kept here forever without coming to any positive conclusion of the questions in controversy at all.

Mr. RANDALL. That is merely a presumption on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. BANKS. One moment if you please. If when one committee of conference fails to agree we have to appoint another without having any information as to the points of disagreement, we shall never come to any conclusion.

Mr. RANDALL. I recollect when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] himself was on a committee of conference, either the third or fourth, and I think he was on the final conference that did agree.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I allude to the conference on the bill raising congressional salaries from $3,000 to $5,000.

Mr. HALE. Does not my friend from Massachusetts see that the request for a new conference is in the interest of conciliation and agreement? The committee do not simply come in and report that they cannot agree, or throw themselves back, saying they will do nothing more, but they ask for a new committee of conference, in the hope they will agree.

Mr. BANKS. They do not express that hope in the report.

Mr. HALE. Is not that the legitimate effect of the request made on the part of the committee?

Mr. BANKS. What I want to know is, if there is a reasonable probability or possibility of agreement?

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot give an answer to that question in the form in which the gentleman propounds it. I have said, however, all that is necessary when I say that a request for an additional conference would not have been made if there had not been a reasonable hope indulged in that an agreement would be arrived at. I call the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the gentleman from Indiana insists on the previous question, I desire to call his attention to the fact that during the last Congress no one in the House was more anxious than he to have those matters of disagreement between the two Houses brought to the attention of the House taken up seriatim and considered. I recollect very distinctly that, on points on which he desired that the House should insist with emphasis, he insisted on having a vote taken as the only way by which the House could instruct the committee of conference.

Now, we are going entirely in the dark as regards this matter. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] yesterday suggested that the majority that had carried these bills through would also control even if we considered separately the points of difference now. But an entirely new element has been brought in to-day. The republicans among us may have no hope of bringing any influence to bear. But the independents of the House feel interested now, and have thought it necessary to ask some questions as to whether there is any prospect of an agreement on this, almost the last day we have before the mails are stopped from being carried through the country.

I think the gentleman from Indiana should carry out the good old rule, and bring those matters before the House, and point out the particular things that he desires to have emphatically insisted on, and then the House managers of the conference would have more confidence in urging what was insisted on by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The usual course has been taken with this bill, such as has been taken in every session of Congress for twenty years past, time and time again, as the gentleman from Iowa is aware. It is the usual course. If the first conferees appointed by the respective bodies do not come to a solution of the differences between them at an early moment they simply report that fact back to their respective Houses. That course is pursued every session of Congress. Gentlemen are aware that on more than one bill it has been pursued already this session. That is the case with reference to the legislative appropriation bill, on which new conferees have been appointed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But the gentleman will see this: that if the points of difference between the two Houses were brought before the House the House might recede. But as it is we are acting entirely in the dark.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must excuse me. I have never known that done except in extreme cases, when the final adjournment was close at hand, until after a second conference had been had on a bill. I admit that in the effort to agree upon the provisions of a bill you may reach a point when it is entirely proper and absolutely necessary that the state of the difference of opinion should be clearly presented, not only to one House, but to both; so that the one or the other may think proper to recede from the disagreement. But we have reached no such stage in the deliberations upon this bill. I call the previous question.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] inform us how near the committee of conference came to an agreement in reference to dollars and cents? Will he give the difference in dollars between the bill as originally passed and the bill as passed by the Senate, together with the amount of difference now existing?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think it at all advisable to state the exact difference of opinion between the two Houses, for that would be a disclosure of what transpired in the committee of conference in their efforts to come to an agreement. I will say further that it is far better for the two Houses in their progress toward an agreement upon this bill not to have their points of agreement presented in a form which may seem to ask for an instruction. I admit that ultimately that may be unavoidable if the bill is to become a law. But we have reached no such point yet in the progress of this bill. The course that I have proposed is the usual one, and I will again express the hope that the bill will become a law by an agreement between the two Houses. I now insist upon the previous question.

Mr. SEELYE. We seem to be acting very much in the dark respecting this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have stated the three leading points of difference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. HOLMAN that the committee of conference be discharged, that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and that a further conference be asked upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as the new committee of conference on the part of the House Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and Mr. HALE.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 5, 8, 10, 11, and 13; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, and 14.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 9 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the words "$2,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,750,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of said amendment the words "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$942,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. BLOUNT,
FRANK JONES,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. A. SARGENT,
A. H. CRAGIN,
R. C. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. The difference between the bill as it passed the House and the bill as amended by the Senate was $2,643,000. The difference between the bill as it passed the House and the bill as agreed to by the committee of conference is $315,000. There is an addition of $250,000 for the Bureau of Construction and Repair and of $65,000 for the Bureau of Steam-Engineering. I now call the previous question on agreeing to the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

Mr. FRYE addressed the House. Before concluding his remarks, which will be published hereafter when completed, he said, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.:) I am physically hardly able to stand, and if the House will adjourn and allow me to go on to-morrow it would be very gratifying to me.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. There being other gentlemen who desire to speak on the Geneva award bill, I move that there be a recess until eight o'clock, when their speeches can be made, and my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] can finish his remarks in the morning.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman propose to devote the evening session to discussion?

Mr. LORD. Simply to debate.

Mr. HALE. No business to be transacted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the House for its information that a desire has been expressed to him by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the House shall sit till five o'clock, and then that a recess shall be taken, on account of the probability of conference reports being presented, on which it may be necessary to take action.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair merely states this fact for the information of the House. He will put the motion of the gentleman from New York, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. LORD. Will the Appropriations Committee occupy the time of the House till five o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will repeat his statement. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has expressed the desire that the House shall remain in session till five o'clock, in view of the probability of reports being presented from conference committees. They do not desire to occupy the time of the House at present.

Mr. LORD. Then I will modify my motion.

Mr. FRYE. I would ask the gentleman from New York if there is not any other member who desires to occupy the time till five o'clock in speaking on the Geneva award bill?

Mr. LORD. There are two gentlemen ready to proceed. I will move that at five o'clock the House take a recess until eight, and that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] be allowed to finish his argument in the morning.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let the motion be to hold a session at eight, without fixing the hour at which the House shall take a recess.

Mr. LORD. I will modify my motion so that when we get ready to take a recess we shall take it till eight o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he cannot very well submit his motion in that form. When the gentlemen who are ready to go on have finished speaking then the motion may be made for a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. LORD. I do.

Mr. LYNDE obtained the floor.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have been waiting for more than two months to call up a bill reported from the Committee on the Freedman's Bank, which has been made a special order, and I have been constantly prevented from calling it up in consequence of the bill in relation to the Geneva award standing in the way. I ask now what is the position of the Geneva award bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is scarcely a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has not before him the exact position of special orders. But he will inform the gentleman from Virginia that the rule adopted by the Chair on Tuesday last was that these special orders should be brought up on the question of consideration in the order in which they stand on the Calendar. The Chair is not informed at this moment where the bill of the gentleman from Virginia stands on the Calendar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am quite aware of what the Chair has just stated. But my parliamentary inquiry is, What is the present attitude of the Geneva award bill before this House? I want to know when and under what circumstances I can call up the bill which is in my charge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Geneva award bill is now before the House as a special order, and its right is to continue from day to day till concluded. Other business may be interjected, but that will not deprive this special order of its privilege and right; and the order of the gentleman from Virginia cannot be reached until this is disposed of.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am aware of that; but I have not been able to hear, in consequence of the confusion prevailing in the Hall, what disposition has been made of the Geneva award bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No disposition has been made of it; it is yet under discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If that bill is not to be further considered this afternoon is it not in order to call up other business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has the floor on the Geneva award bill, and yielded for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] to introduce a bill for reference.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, had agreed to the conference asked on the part of the House, and had appointed Mr. DORSEY, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. RANDOLPH as managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced that Mr. GORDON had been appointed in the place of Mr. THURMAN as one of the conferees on its part on the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

It further announced the passage of a joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) to provide for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

JOHN S. BISHOP.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3807) for the relief of John S. Bishop; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, the only foundation for any claim whatever, either against Great Britain or the United States, is based upon the fact that Great Britain has violated the laws of neutrality, the three rules that were agreed upon by the commissioners of the two governments in the treaty of Washington. Aside from that violation of those rules there is no foundation for any claim either against Great Britain or the United States.

It was agreed between Great Britain and the United States that the amount of damage occasioned by the violation of those treaty stipulations should be referred to the board of arbitration which met at Geneva, composed of learned, able men, selected by both governments from different nations of the world. The whole subject was referred to that board to determine what damage or what indemnity Great Britain should pay by reason of the violation of those rules. That board met, and after evidence being produced on both sides, and after hearing able counsel representing the interests of both nations, the board determined what was due to the United States for the violation of those rules. In so determining the arbitrators passed upon the question of the character of the claims that a neutral power should be obliged to pay for breach of neutrality; they fixed the rights of claimants.

The gentleman who last occupied the floor upon this subject [Mr. FRYE] admits, and there can be no dispute, that that board of arbitration ruled out of consideration the claim of our Government for the expense of pursuing the confederate cruisers, the claim of our citizens for war premiums, and the claim of our Government for the prolongation of the war. They confined the measure of damages to the destruction of property occasioned by the three confederate cruisers, the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne.

It is very easy from the evidence that was before that board of arbitration, and from the published documents that are before us, to determine just what those losses were. They amount in the aggregate to over $14,000,000, and with the exception of $200,000 they were vessels and property of American citizens that were destroyed by those confederate cruisers. After confining the rule of damages to this class of property and to this class of losses the arbitrators brought in an award of $15,500,000, which has been paid to our Government.

Now, by what course of argument any sensible man, any lawyer, can suppose that our Government, having received this $15,500,000 from the British government for the property of our citizens destroyed by these three cruisers, can give it to parties who had no claim whatever against the British government and no claim whatever against our own, it is impossible for me to see.

A private citizen has no redress individually against a foreign nation, cannot pursue a foreign nation for any damage committed by a violation of international law. His only remedy is through his Government. His Government is bound to protect him. If his property has been destroyed in violation of treaty rights or of the law of nations, his Government must demand the redress, and the demand is always made in the name of the Government. Therefore this claim was prosecuted in the name of the United States, it is true; but it was prosecuted because of the destruction of the property of American citizens, and necessarily for the benefit of the citizens whose property was so destroyed.

I do not think it necessary to enter into a technical discussion of the laws of a trustee or of a cestui que trust. It seems to me that the rule of common honesty would require that where money is recovered for injuries done to a man, that money should be paid over to him in compensation of his damages; and especially where it is the duty of the Government to protect its own citizens from damage done by a foreign nation, and that Government does receive indemnity from that foreign nation for the damage so inflicted, that money should be paid to the citizen who has suffered the injury.

I listened yesterday to a very interesting and very ingenious argument by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] in regard to the title to property, and the distinction drawn by him between a municipal title and a paramount title, both titles existing at the same time. The illustration referred to was where the Government purchased a large territory like the purchase of Florida from Spain, or the purchase of Louisiana from France, which did not interfere with the individual property of the citizens. It was a new distinction to me; I had never heard before of that distinction in the title to property.

It was claimed that this recovery by the United States against Great Britain was not for the municipal title, as the gentleman called the title of the citizen to the property or vessel destroyed, but was for the paramount title of the United States to the vessel. I know of but one ownership, and that is that of the citizen, who is the absolute owner. It is true the Government in time of war has a right to take possession of vessels, if necessary, for the purpose of carrying on some enterprise in the course of a war; but that is by the right of eminent domain, of sovereign power in the nature of the right of eminent domain, and relates to the possession of the vessel, but constitutes no title whatever to the property.

Throughout the whole of this arbitration these claims were represented as the claims of private citizens, of American citizens, for losses which this Government and its citizens had been subject to by reason of the violation of these rules of neutrality. It is contended by the friends of this bill that this money can now be applied to any American citizen who has suffered loss by reason of these confederate cruisers being afloat. It is upon that ground. It is claimed that war-premium men, having paid additional premiums for insurance on account of the dangers of the sea from these cruisers, are entitled to have returned to them the money they so expended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I recur again to the position which I took at the outset of my remarks, that a citizen has no claim against the Government of the United States for property destroyed by an enemy in war; that there can be no claim against our Government or against Great Britain except by reason of Great Britain violating the rules of neutrality; and the claims which are properly to be considered against a neutral government for the violation of those rules have been passed upon by this board of arbitration, have been determined by it; this board, by the agreement of both nations, has decided that question definitely and conclusively. We have no right to question that decision; Great Britain has no right to question it. That board has decided that war premiums cannot be considered by the laws of nations, and constitute no claim against a neutral nation for compensation. Then, if these parties had no claim against Great Britain, what right have they to this fund? Not because this fund was paid by Great Britain in compensation of the damages suffered by our citizens, but because the board of arbitration has decided that it does not constitute a claim against any other nation; and if it does not, it is damage suffered by our citizens as incident to the war, for which they are entitled to no compensation from any government, not even their own. If our Government would undertake at this late day to compensate every citizen for the loss he suffered by this war, there would be no limit to the indebtedness we must incur.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] in his argument to-day, has referred to the decision of the arbitrators upon these claims; and he has stated that our Government sacrificed the claims of our citizens for the purpose of getting these three rules as to the liability of neutrals fixed and determined. He is entirely mistaken upon that point. These three rules were fixed in the treaty of Washington a long time before that board of arbitration met. That board had nothing to do with fixing the three rules. All that it had to do was to determine as to the construction of those three rules, as to what character of claims should be received and what damages should be recovered for the violation of those three rules. And, Mr. Speaker, there was nothing done or said by our Government that changed or affected the construction of that board of arbitration upon that subject.

The gentleman referred to the rule which requires due diligence on the part of a neutral in preventing vessels from escaping; and he said it was established there that the neutral government should have notice before it should be held liable. Mr. Speaker, there was no agreement between the parties when that matter was settled. After that protocol was entered into, after these indirect claims were excluded upon the ground that they were not proper claims according to international law, then the board of arbitration called upon the counsel on both sides to discuss the question as to what the term "due diligence" did mean and what it did include. It was one of the last arguments made by the counsel on both sides before those arbitrators. After hearing counsel, they determined that question not by agreement, but upon the argument of counsel, and according to the laws of nations. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that our Government yielded one inch in that respect. It contended all through for all the claims it had put in until those claims were ruled out by the arbitrators as not being proper claims to be introduced before the board.

Mr. LORD. Is not the gentleman aware that it was upon the motion of Mr. Charles Francis Adams that those claims were ruled against by the tribunal; that Mr. Adams, finding the Senate had adjourned and that the supplementary treaty would not be carried through, advised the tribunal to find in that regard just as they did find, rather than have the treaty fall through?

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing of this matter except what appears of record; and I find in protocol 5 what I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. LORD. I do not refer to the protocol. The history of the case shows under whose advise that action was taken.

Mr. LYNDE. The protocol states that it was the unanimous opinion of the arbitrators that these claims were not a proper subject-matter of arbitration, and were not proper subjects for an award of damages. I ask the Clerk to read from the protocol.

The Clerk read as follows:

The application of the agent of Her Britannic Majesty's government being now before the arbitrators, the president of the tribunal [Count Sclopis] proposes to make the following communication on the part of the arbitrators to the parties interested:

The arbitrators wish it to be understood that in the observations which they are about to make they have in view solely the application of the agent of Her Britannic Majesty's government, which is now before them, for an adjournment, which might be prolonged till the month of February in next year; and the motives for that application, namely, the difference of opinion which exists between Her Britannic Majesty's government and the Government of the United States as to the competency of the tribunal, under the treaty of Washington, to deal with the claims advanced in the case of the United States in respect of losses under the several heads of, first, "The losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;" second, "The enhanced payments of insurance;" and, third, "The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion;" and the hope which her Britannic Majesty's government does not abandon, that if sufficient time were given for that purpose, a solution of the difficulty which has thus arisen, by the negotiation of a supplementary convention between the two governments, might be found practicable.

The arbitrators do not propose to express or imply any opinion upon the point thus in difference between the two governments as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty; but it seems to them obvious that the substantial object of the adjournment must be to give the two governments an opportunity of determining whether the claims in question shall or shall not be submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, and that any difference between the two governments on this point may make the adjournment unproductive of any useful effect, and, after a delay of many months, during which both nations may be kept in a state of painful suspense, may end in a result which, it is to be presumed, both governments would equally deplore, that of making this arbitration wholly abortive. This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, the decision of that board as it has been just read by the Clerk at the desk settles the question as to the character of the claims a neutral nation shall be subject to pay for violation of the three rules adopted in the treaty of Washington.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in the course of his argument said, that we had been trying for nearly one hundred years to get those rules adopted by Great Britain. I think he is entirely mistaken. We never made the attempt, and although it was provided in the last clause of the sixth article of that treaty that Great Britain and the United States would endeavor to get those same rules adopted by the great powers of the world, not a single step has been taken from that day to this by Great Britain or the United States to get those rules adopted by any other nation. Notwithstanding the construction which was placed upon those rules by that board of arbitration, limiting the damage to which the neutral nation should be subject for their violation, neither Great Britain nor the United States would be content to have those rules adopted by the other great powers in the world and be subject to the damages which they award. Notwithstanding that board of arbitration has said in the construction of these rules no indirect damages shall ever be received and adjudicated upon or claimed as against neutral powers, and nothing but the strict destruction of property shall be considered in those claims, yet neither Great Britain nor the United States is willing or desirous that the rule with that construction shall be extended to the other great powers of the world.

What is the operation of it? If France and Great Britain were at war to-day, and France goes into San Francisco and buys a Pacific mail steamer and puts out upon the ocean, and after she gets out of the jurisdiction of the United States arms and equips that steamer, then puts into a port at Alaska, and there the British consul notifies the American officer at that port that that vessel is endeavoring to coal, that she has come in for repairs, to coal and to recruit, and he does not stop her but allows her to go out, what is the rule adopted here? It is that every vessel afterward destroyed by that steamer so long as she lives or floats upon the sea during that war the United States Government must compensate the other nation for. It is a rule neither Great Britain nor the United States wishes to be extended or promulgated to any greater extent.

That was the case of the Shenandoah. She belonged to the East India trade. She was owned by Bombay merchants, and, according to my recollection, was known by the name of the Sea King. She was bought in England, was furnished with her arms and equipment after she left England.

Mr. LORD. That is a mistake. She was armed, equipped, and manned in England. The only change made was that she took a confederate captain from the South.

Mr. LYNDE. Here is the statement of the facts given in the opinion of Mr. Staempfli. Each one of the arbitrators in giving his opinion was required to give a statement of the facts as to each of these vessels and the law applicable to each:

1. This vessel was originally the Sea King, a merchant-vessel belonging to a firm in Bombay; she was employed in the East India trade, and was built at Glasgow in 1863. She was a long, rakish vessel of seventeen hundred tons, with engines of two hundred and twenty horse-power, (Robertson & Co., who sold her, say only one hundred and fifty horse-power, and not two hundred and twenty,) making ten knots an hour; she had made three hundred and twenty miles in twenty-four hours; and was built by celebrated ship-builders on the Clyde.

2. She left in November, 1863, for New Zealand and for the China Seas, and returned to London with a cargo of tea. Before her voyage to New Zealand, Dudley saw her at Glasgow, and pointed her out to his superiors as a steamer likely to be intended for a privateer.

3. On the 20th September, 1864, she was sold in London to Richard Wright, of Liverpool, a British subject, and father-in-law to Prioleau, head partner of Fraser, Trenholm & Co. The sale was registered the same day.

4. On the 7th October, 1864, Wright gave a power of attorney to a man named Corbett, a British subject, (who was implicated in matters connected with vessels running the blockade,) enabling him to sell the vessel whenever he could within six months, at a minimum price of £45,000 sterling.

5. On the 8th October, 1864, she cleared for Bombay; left London with a crew of forty-seven men, having first taken in coal and provisions for twelve months. She had on board two eighteen-pounder guns on carriages, (twelve-pounders, according to the British Counter Case, page 103.) The same night the southern agent at Liverpool was informed of her departure, by telegraph.

6. On the 8th October, 1864, the very same night, the Laurel, screw-steamer, nearly new, and of first-class make, left Liverpool with about twenty citizens of the Southern States on board, and some cases marked "machinery," which contained guns and gun-carriages, such as are used on board ships of war. The Laurel and the Sea King had arranged to meet in the bay of Funchal, in the island of Madeira.

7. On the 19th of October the Sea King arrived off Funchal; the Laurel had preceded her by two days. The two ships met and effected the transshipment of the cannon, &c., (six large guns, two small, carriages, munitions, powder, muskets, &c.) For this thirty-six hours sufficed. Corbett then came forward, announced the sale of the Sea King, and tried to induce the crew to remain. Out of eighty sailors, however, only twenty-three remained. The officers and men retained in the Sea King numbered in all forty-two, and hardly formed half her proper complement, which forced her to use her engines.

She took the name of the Shenandoah, and continued on her way under the insurgent flag.

Mr. LORD. Did not the guns come from England?

Mr. LYNDE. Yes.

Mr. LORD. Did not the vessel come from England?

Mr. LYNDE. Yes.

Mr. LORD. Did not the guns and armament come from England?

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly; the vessel came from England, there is no question about that; but up to the present award, up to the time this treaty was adopted, a neutral always had a right to sell contraband of war in neutral territory, that is, in its own territory. But I say when the Shenandoah left England she was not manned and equipped for war.

Mr. LORD. But her arms and equipment came out in a vessel immediately after her, in the Laurel, as appears by what has just been read.

Mr. LYNDE. It has been allowable for vessels engaged in the East India trade to carry guns. That is well known.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all I care to say about the right of those parties whose claims alone were allowed by the board of arbitrators to be claims against neutrals.

And now, it being established that those whose property was destroyed were the only parties whose claims were allowed by that board, I cannot see upon what ground it is urged that the insurance companies are not entitled to the losses which they met with. These vessels that were insured were destroyed, and the owners received compensation for the value of the vessels in the insurance. I will not read again the language of Webster in the French spoliation claims. But it is a fact that both under the Spanish treaty and under the French treaty the claims of insurance companies have been allowed, as against the fund which was paid in by the Spanish and French governments, and which our Government was bound to pay by those treaties for the losses which were incurred. And there never has been an exception. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] who spoke on yesterday cited a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in the case of Robert Campbell, I think, where the Government, in time of war, had taken possession of a vessel, and that vessel before she was returned was destroyed by fire—as the case says, "without negligence or fault of the owner"—and the insurance company came in and claimed as against the Government that they were entitled to be subrogated for the owners, and receive the value of that property as against the Government. That is a case entirely different from the one now before this House. There the Government had not received the money for the vessel. There the Government had exercised a right which it always claims to exercise in time of war, that where it is necessary for the public service to take possession of a vessel, it will take possession of the vessel, and if that vessel is destroyed it will compensate the owner for the value of the vessel. But the insurance companies, as the decision says, knowing this to be the law, take the risk when they take the insurance. That is a naked claim against the Government when there is no fund and no property in the hands of the Government to re-imburse the parties. Here is a case where the Government has received the full value of this property, where the only evidence before the arbitrators of the laws was the evidence presented by the insurance company, for the original owners had already received their pay; they were no longer interested in the recovery of the amount, and the loss is proved by the insurance companies, and on that proof the Government receives the money.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.

Mr. LORD. Is the gentleman aware of the number of judgments that have been awarded in the court of commissioners of Alabama claims in favor of the owners of vessels?

Mr. LYNDE. Yes, sir; I am aware of it. And I am aware they have always been awarded without question where there was no insurance upon the property.

Mr. LORD. They are included in the treaty, I think.

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly they are. But I am not speaking of that class of claims where the owner represented his own loss, and where there was no insurance on the vessel. I am speaking of that class of claims where the insurance company had paid the loss and the owner was no longer interested in it.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. LYNDE. Certainly.

Mr. LORD. Is the gentleman aware that by the act of the Forty-third Congress the difference between the amount of the insurance and the value of the vessel was directed to be paid to the owners.

Mr. LYNDE. Yes, sir; I am aware of it, and that is right. I am speaking now of the cases where the insurance companies paid for the property which was destroyed. They paid for it because it was lost, and therefore it was lost to them. It was their loss. And now the question whether they had made money from other parties by premiums which they had received on other property has nothing whatever to do with that loss.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman permit me another question, and I am through?

Mr. LYNDE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LORD. Under the law of subrogation, as regards the spes recuperandi, is it not true that the insurer is entitled to the difference between the insurance and the value of the vessel?

Mr. LYNDE. No, sir.

Mr. LORD. I say he is.

Mr. LYNDE. The insurance company, wherever it recovers in admiralty for a loss for a collision, is only entitled to retain the amount of money that it has paid upon the policy. If the vessel is valued, for instance, at $15,000 and the insurance company takes $12,000, the owner is then his own insurer for $3,000, and the owner would be entitled, if they should recover $15,000, to the difference between the $12,000 and the $15,000. That is the law of subrogation, as I understand it.

Mr. Speaker, it is now approaching the hour when the House would wish to take a recess, and I have already taken more time than I expected to take upon this question. I therefore yield the floor.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] will yield to me for a moment, there is a joint resolution on the Speaker's table which I would like to have referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, the joint resolution (S. No. 18) to provide for defraying temporarily the ordinary and necessary expenses of the public service was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] desire to proceed now?

Mr. WARREN. No, sir; I understand there is to be a meeting of the House to-night for general debate.

Mr. LORD. I now move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock, and that the session of the House this evening be for debate only.

Mr. RANDALL. If the arrangement is that the meeting this evening shall be for debate only, I would like to have it understood that communications between the two Houses are excepted.

Mr. KASSON. Is the Senate to be in session this evening?

Mr. RANDALL. I understand it may be.

Mr. LORD. I will make that part of my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire if there should be any communication from the Senate to be made to the House this evening it shall not be interfered with by any order assigning the evening to debate only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It may be understood that business to the extent indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be transacted, and that for all other purposes the session for this evening is for debate only.

Mr. KASSON. Let it be understood that there is no vote to be taken.

Mr. RANDALL. That is understood; but I would like the House to be put in possession of any communication from the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would include the appropriate reference of such communication?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But not taking the sense of the House on the question of concurrence?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; that would require the presence of a quorum.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that no vote will be taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding. No vote will be taken on any subject.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale;

SETTLEMENT OF THE BLACK HILLS.

Mr. KIDDER. Mr. Speaker, on the 28th day of February last I introduced the following bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of country in the Territory of Dakota lying between the forty-third and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude and the one hundred and second degree of west longitude and the western boundary of the Territory of Dakota is hereby declared to be open to exploration and settlement; and the true intent and meaning of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, is declared to be that men and women are not excluded thereby from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon any portion of said Territory included within said boundaries.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for any person or persons to travel upon, over, or through, on foot or otherwise, any Indian reservation in said Territory, for the purpose of arriving at, going to, or reaching any point or place within the boundaries aforesaid, and returning therefrom in the same manner.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

The area of the Sioux Indian reservation in Dakota, including all additions, is 56,072 square miles, or 35,886,080 acres. The area of that portion of this reservation lying west of the one hundred and second degree of west longitude, which includes the Black Hills, is 30,636 square miles, which will leave, after this portion is opened for settlement, as a reservation 25,436 square miles, or 16,279,040 acres. More than one-third of the entire Territory of Dakota is now included in this reservation.

The number of Indians parties to this treaty, as reported by the several agents, is (men, women, and children) 40,391.

If these lands had been assigned to the Indians in severalty, each Indian, squaw, and papoose would have had a title to more than 888 acres. Take from this reservation 30,436 square miles, what this bill calls for, and then there will be reserved for each Indian man, woman, and child over 482 acres, when a white man, including his family, is entitled to only his rights by pre-emption, homestead, and timber culture, 480. Pass this bill and there is left for each Indian, estimating six in each family of white men, more than five times as much land as we are severally entitled to.

Our Government agreed to subsist these Indians, by stipulation in this treaty, four years; but since the expiration of that time (1873) it has continued to feed them until up to the time of the making of the report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1875 it had expended for that purpose $3,395,000.

The treaty was never "approved" by Congress.

The statute which authorized the making of the treaty (vide 15 Statutes at Large, page 17, section 2) reads as follows:

The commissioners are required to select a district of country for the Indians, and "when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for said Indians," &c.

The treaty was not before the House. The House never considered or passed upon it. It was ratified by the Senate only, and therefore not "approved by Congress," as the act authorizing the commission to treat with the Indians required it to be; consequently the so-called treaty did not become a law.

AUTHORITIES IN POINT.

1. A treaty under the Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably, applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of Government can be regarded as law until it shall have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress without the signature of the President was a law, (vide seventh circuit of Michigan, 1852, Turner vs. American Baptist Missionary Union, 5 McLean, page 344.)

Congress may repeal a treaty; (first circuit of Massachusetts, 1855, Taylor vs. Morton; 2 Curtis, circuit court, page 454; affirmed, 2 Black, page 486.)

Congress may abrogate a treaty, provided the subject-matter is within the legislative power of Congress. (United States vs. Tobacco Factory, 1 Dill.)

As well might we say that an ordinary statute is passed and has become a law when it has not been concurred in by either the House or Senate.

This treaty, then, not having been "approved by Congress," the House not having acted upon it, is not only voidable but void, and is not binding upon either party, and before I close these remarks I will try to satisfy you, sir, that the Indians, allowing their acts to demonstrate their meaning, so regarded it. The authorities upon this point are all one way. None can be found contravening the doctrine here laid down.

2. Again, as to the title of the Indians to their reservations. The right of Indians in their lands is that of occupancy alone. Possession, when abandoned, attaches itself to the fee without further grant. (19 Wallace, United States vs. Cook, page 591.) The fee is in the United States; this is the title by which they hold their lands. It was so decided by the Supreme Court as early as 1823 in Johnson vs. McIntosh 8 Wheaton, page 574. The authority of this case has never been doubted. (1 Kent, page 257; Worcester vs. Georgia, 6 Peters, page 580; Cherokee Nation vs. Georgia, 5 Peters, page 48.)

The last point made in relation to the title of the Indians to their lands is not presented to sustain the doctrine in this case that the Indians have abandoned the reservation, because the facts will not sustain it. They have not, in accordance with legal technicality, abandoned it, but the truth is they have never occupied the Black Hills part of it for any purpose whatever, and are now only standing guard at the portal thereof like the "dog in the manger," except that they may also satiate their blood-thirsty appetites in the warm, gushing gore of inoffensive victims. This point is presented to merely show that the equities in this regard are all in the United States.

The stipulations of the treaty have been broken on the part of the savages; we are therefore under no obligation to support them or not to occupy this reservation.

For the sake of the argument only, we will admit that the treaty was ratified according to law and is binding upon the parties, and insist that it has been broken by the acts of the Indians in such a manner that our Government is in no way under the least obligation to respect it, and it should be regarded by us as null and void.

I purpose now to ventilate this view of the question, and inquire—

Have the Indians lived up to the obligations of the treaty on their part?

By article 11, among other things, the Indians agreed "that they will not attack any persons at home or traveling, nor molest nor disturb any wagon-trains, coaches, mules, or cattle" of other persons; "that they will not attempt to harm white persons," &c.

We are told by persons who boast of their Christian philanthropy and transcendent love for the Indian that all of our troubles with these people, the robberies and murders they commit upon the whites, are the legitimate result of our tyranny and oppression of them.

How convenient for philanthropic purposes and advancement of human efforts to benefit these Indians, whether pretended or real, practical or impractical, this may be in excusing the barbarities of the savages, it lacks the essential quality of truth to sustain it, while it tends to engender a false and sickly sympathy in behalf of the Indian race and a prejudice toward our own.

No reliance can be placed in the plighted faith of the North American Indian until he has become civilized and enlightened. The fictions of Cooper and Longfellow have no existence in fact; they are purely imaginary and meretricious. This want of fidelity is shown by their utter disregard of their treaty stipulations and in all their dealings with the white man.

See what our Government has done for them, as I have before stated, by way of furnishing them subsistence. What have they done in return? From the day they fixed their cross to this treaty hitherto they have been engaged in predatory raids upon our western frontier, robbing and murdering the white settlers, sparing neither age nor sex, nor condition in life, committing such "hellish torture as can only be suggested by savage lust." Hundreds, yes, I may with truthfulness say thousands, (if we could ever arrive at the facts,) of our frontier settlers, whom this Government of ours is bound to protect, have fallen victims to the frighful forays of these barbarians.

Human life and property have not been secure from the midnight incursion, the fatal rifle-shot, the tomahawk, and scalping-knife. More than two hundred American citizens (we know) while employed in lawful pursuits in the Northwest, and on the ceded lands, too, have been murdered by the Sioux within the last seven years and before the attempted occupation of the Black Hills by the whites. Miners, wood-choppers, steamboat-men, and others have been ruthlessly murdered by them while in quiet pursuit of their legitimate business, and our Government at the same time expending millions of dollars annually for the support of these same Sioux, without consideration therefor or expectation of being benefited thereby.

In view of these facts (and strange and horrible as it may appear) it is our frontier history. I ask what kind of a claim, if any, have they upon us?

I have lived upon the frontier about twenty years, and have had an opportunity to know as much by ocular observation as a man who has never crossed going westward the Hudson or Mississippi Rivers.

To-day Sitting Bull and his associated chiefs, who were parties to this treaty, with their three thousand warriors from their strongholds on the Yellowstone and Powder Rivers, hundreds of miles from their reservation, shake their bloody girdles of white men's scalps, on some of which the human gore has not yet coagulated, in the faces of your officers, and bid defiance to your laws and military authority.

SPECIFICATIONS AGAINST THE SIOUX.

In 1870 fifteen men were murdered by these Indians on the Missouri River just below Fort Peck. The steamer Key West, when navigating these waters in 1871, was fired into and the clerk was shot through the body. Ten men were murdered by them near the present site of Carroll on the Missouri. Near Fort Lincoln, Bismarck, and Fort Berthold, annually since 1868, many white men have been killed by them, and in all over twenty-nine. In 1873 above and near Fort Rice seven white men were slain by them. In the fall and winter of 1874–'75 thirteen men were killed by Sitting Bull's party on the Yellowstone River. In Judith Basin twenty-four men were murdered by the Sioux between the years 1870 and 1875. Within the time last named more than one hundred persons have been killed by them on the North Platte and north of the Union Pacific Railroad, while all along the Missouri down as far as Running Water white men have been murdered by these Indians nearly every year. The steamers navigating the Missouri River have been fired into every year since 1869 by the Sioux lying in ambush, and their men have often been killed and wounded. No less than five boats carrying Government supplies on the Upper Missouri were fired into in 1874, and several of the crews were killed and many wounded. A year has not passed since this treaty was made that they have not fired into the steamers navigating this river.

Now, sir, I ask any one to point out to me a rational cause, an excuse even, for the perpetration of these cowardly crimes and the long and loud denunciations of the white man's inhumanity toward the Indians and of the eulogies heaped upon the transcendental virtues and the fidelity of these robbers and murderers.

Again, the Government has paid to various parties since the conclusion of this treaty, on account of the depredations of these Indians on the property of our fellow citizens, the sum of $15,130.24, and it ought to have paid millions of dollars for this purpose, and that sum would not liquidate their indebtedness to us in this respect.

They have never attempted to utilize the country known as "Black Hills;" never hunted or fished therein; and had it not been for the restless mental activity of our citizens, which is ever seeking unexplored fields in science as well as in geography, and which gave to us the priceless treasures of California and the west coast, the silver of Nevada and Colorado, and acres of Texas, and developed in the Black Hills country golden treasures, these graceless paupers of the nation never would have dreamed of going into it. To them it had no attractions until the white man came and gave to them an easy chance to add to their decorations bleeding scalps, and well have they availed themselves of this golden opportunity. And yet, sir, this race, these Indians, we have always carefully protected, sheltered, fed; nay, more, invited here to this city, made them the guests of the nation, fêted and honored them in as ostentatious a manner as we have ever done to representatives of nations equal to us in all that makes a nation great, "industry and education;" made them honored guests, while at their waists hung scalps of our bold pioneers—pioneers who felled the forests, bridged the streams, and developed such States as Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois; yes, the entire grand West.

Sad to say, we are to have the perpetual heritage of a race devoid of all sentiment of principle, senseless to an animation of joy, except springing from an act of cruelty redolent with blood and echoing with the agonized cry of the tortured victim. These are the "noble men of the forest," for which we are to pray for, pay for forever, while the widows and orphans they make annually weep, starve, and die.

Sir, in the face of this and more, so horrible that it cannot be spoken aloud, only whispered among those who know of their atrocities, I would like to know if there can be any obligation, legally, morally, in justice, or equity, or "the allegiance we owe to God and our country," to adhere to the misnamed treaty stipulations. Would we have suffered, unless compelled ri et armis, from any nation such treatment to our citizens? If a treaty did exist, who suffers from its violations? Most surely the party who violates it. When the pirates from Tripoli outraged our commercial pride the young nation hesitated not a moment, and demanded and received prompt satisfaction. No; this sickly sympathy, born in false teachings, reared beyond the reach of the arrow and tomahawk, must be taught to know that the pioneers have a right to live in quiet possession of homes wrung from field and forest, blessed by love of wife and caresses of children, undisturbed by the yell, tomahawk, and shot of these "treaty wards of the nation."

Now, sir, these atrocities, depredations, and murders were not committed by the lower grade of the Indians, but were instigated and participated in by the head-men and chiefs of the various tribes, many of whom had just returned from the sweet endearments of Washington's national hospitality. These leaders were not ignorant of their responsibilities, but were conscious that if caught there was sufficient pulpit and press sympathy to enable them to escape punishment. Need I allude to the instances where conviction and sentence to death have been pardoned by appeal to the Executive by those striving to do right, have erred mightily.

With these facts before us, can any man say they have lived up to their treaty stipulations? No, sir.

Treaty or no treaty, we shall ever continue to take care of them. The Divine Master said to his chosen apostles: "The poor I leave with you." He must have meant, as to the United States, "Lo, the the poor I leave with you," as a perpetual heritage. The Black Hills are of no use to them, as I have said before, neither as a hunting or fishing country; but to us in the West particularly, and to the entire nation, of incalculable value. Opened up by our hardy and industrious people, soon a populous country will be known, and in a shorter space of time than Colorado, with her acknowledged wealth, will come a new State, to add light and beauty to the glorious constellation of States.

Pass this bill, and you invite to a healthy, salubrious, and fertile country the masses who are dying for want of space in your beautiful cities; deny it, and you simply put blocks in front of the car which "westward takes it course." Pass it, and you benefit the Indian in spite of himself, for then each one will possess in his own right more land than he can ever occupy and enjoy.

Doing justice to our white settlers, to our anxious emigrant, to thousands in the Old World who want to come to our free land will benefit them, and in time, it is to be hoped, remove them from "in puris naturalibus" condition to one where the Christian friends who are anxious to help them may hope of success.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF THE BLACK HILLS.

That gold is in the Black Hills pioneers have known for more than thirty years. The geological survey of Professor Hayden over ten years ago established that fact. The explorations of Professor Jenney in 1875 were sufficiently thorough to establish beyond a doubt that valuable gold fields exist there. Within the last six months citizens of my Territory have gone there comparatively poor and have returned "well off." That more than one hundred thousand dollars' worth of gold dust has been taken out of these hills by the people of Dakota alone, been brought home and there sold, is a fact of which I have personal knowledge.

That sentiment which is founded on the great popular idea of inalienable rights inherent in the bosom of every man which has felled forests and peopled the plains from one ocean to the other attempted to open the Black Hills in 1874 and 1875. Squads of men were there, inoffensively, quietly, taking the precious metal from the "auriferous gulches which furrow its mountain-slopes." Whereupon a military order was issued to "put out" these men therefrom, and as they were seemingly slow in getting out, many of them were arrested, confined in military prisons and other bastiles for months, and, in numerous instances their teams and entire outfit were taken from them by the military authorities, and their wagons and subsistence destroyed by fire. Such acts on the part of those who consummated them were without authority of law and an outrage upon the rights of peaceful citizens.

But since the explorations of Professor Jenney, and within a few months, the Black Hills have become occupied by a large population of the bone and sinew, the bold and hardy yeomanry of our country. It is estimated that there are at least eight thousand men there pursuing the even tenor of their way, tilling the soil, planting crops, fencing their lands, building houses, making homes for the beloved ones left behind them, and who are anxiously waiting for the blissful moment of reunion with their brave husbands and fathers, and until recently without any interference from our Government. But the Indians, wanting new relays for their girdles, and in strict accordance with their custom for the last hundred years, were continually murdering innocent men, women, and children outside of their reservation in the Territory of Wyoming and elsewhere, and committing such nameless crimes the contemplation of which makes humanity's warm life-blood congeal at its source and stand still in its fastnesses, caused this order to emanate:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY,
Washington, May 26, 1876.

General P. H. SHERIDAN, Chicago:

I have just been to the President with Governor Thayer. After reading the papers and some discussion, the President said that the people who had gone to the Black Hills of Dakota, inside the Sioux Indian reservation, or who may hereafter go there, are there wrongfully, and they should be notified of the fact; but the Government is engaged in certain measures that will probably result in opening up the country to occupation and settlement. In the mean time the Indians should not be allowed to scalp and kill anybody, and you are authorized to afford protection to all persons who are conveying food and stores for those already there. I understand that arrangements are now in progress with Red Cloud and Spotted Tail to remove, and mean time the agency Indians should be kept near the agencies.

If satisfactory arrangements are not concluded, the new orders will be made as to whites who have intruded on the Sioux reservation.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

About four weeks ago the United States Indian agent at the Cheyenne agency on the Missouri River addressed a letter to the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs that three friendly Indians had been killed by men going to the Black Hills over the Fort Pierre route, and that an Indian war was inevitable if travel thereon was not interrupted. Thereupon the following order was issued:

SAINT PAUL, MINNESOTA, June 2, 1876.

To the Commanding Officer at Fort Sully, Dakota Territory:

In compliance with instructions from the General of the Army, just received from the Lieutenant-General, you are directed to take such steps as will prevent emigrants from going to the Black Hills over the Sioux reservation by the Fort Pierre route, and you are further directed to use the troops at your command to enforce these instructions to the best of your ability.

By command of General Terry.

RUGGLES,
Acting Adjutant-General.

Pursuant to which the commanding officer at Fort Sully stopped all provision trains and men en route for the Black Hills, and forbid their crossing the river there. In a short time hundreds of tons of freight were landed there destined for the gold region, and hundreds of men in charge of the same, but were detained or turned back by the military authorities. This fact being made known to the Government, this order was issued:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1876.

General P. H. SHERIDAN, Chicago, Illinois:

Judge KIDDER, of Dakota, represents that there are about a hundred tons of provisions at Fort Pierre, ready for the Black Hills, and that the commanding officer forbids their going. We have just seen the President, who consents that these provisions may be hauled out, but that no escort can be given. You may instruct accordingly.

The commanding officer should see that the parties who go out with the train are armed and prepared to defend the train and to prevent its falling into the hands of hostile Indians. Judge KIDDER has been very zealous in this matter in the interests of his Territory.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

The commanding officer at Fort Sully, being "hard of hearing," or very slow, or not knowing the order was issued, had not, up to the 20th of June, permitted the provisions to be "hauled out," when, "forbearance ceasing to be a virtue," the order enlarging his instructions was issued in these words:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 20, 1876.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Commanding Division of Missouri, Chicago, Illinois:

In regard to the route to Black Hills from Fort Pierre, you may instruct that well-organized trains may go out and return with provisions, but they can have no military escort. The trains must take their own risk.

Instruct the officers accordingly.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Of the result of this order I am not informed.

Newspapers inform us that—

We have good evidence that the route to Custer City from Cheyenne is now guarded against Indian depredations by Companies K of the Third Infantry and H of the Twenty-third Infantry, and that General Sheridan was promised adequate military guard for the Cheyenne route. We have also good evidence that Captain Tolman's company of the First Infantry is now patrolling the Missouri River in the vicinity of Fort Pierre for the purpose of preventing all travel from Southern Dakota to the hills.

Colonel Townsend, commanding Fort Laramie, announces, among other things, that—

Two companies of cavalry will constantly patrol the road between this post and Custer City for the protection of travelers.

It appears, then, relying upon these orders and this information, that there is only one ingress and egress to the Black Hills, and that is by the way of the Union Pacific Railroad. In connection with these facts I desire to state another, that to get to the Black Hills from Fort Pierre via the Union Pacific Railroad the emigrants at Fort Pierre will have to travel over one thousand miles farther than to go direct from there, it being from Fort Pierre only one hundred and twenty miles to Custer City. Chicago is over three hundred miles nearer the Black Hills via Yankton, Dakota, than it is by way of Cheyenne, Wyoming, and the road through the former Territory is very much better. This extra distance, then, in order to enjoy the lovely scenery of the gold-bearing hills and the ecstasy of anticipated riches, must be traveled over, not only by the good people of Dakota, but by the people of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and other States east of the Missouri River and north of the forty-second parallel.

This I call an outrage upon these people too grievous to be borne. We are willing to submit to any general order controlling alike the people on both sides of the Black Hills. We are willing to be excluded from them if all are, but we cannot consent to stultify ourselves, belittle our intelligence, and smother that inherent right of justice and equality which was implanted in the bosom of every man by Him who from the beginning has carried the scales of justice equipoise, by remaining silent or passive when so great a wrong has been perpetrated in a manner that it is known by a gazing world.

The Fort Pierre route should be opened at once or the Cheyenne route should be closed. This would be meting out even-handed justice. The closing of this route and the protection of the routes from Cheyenne and Fort Laramie by the military is such an exhibition of favoritism in favor of the latter routes and the injustice to the former is so flagrant that the people of Dakota feel that they have a right to speak in language that will not be misunderstood, and demand that justice shall be done them by being placed upon an equality with those residing west of the Black Hills.

Only one way to get into the Black Hills? I have been taught to believe that I can start from any place and go to any other place in the world. But I give that up now. One is obliged to start either at Sidney, Cheyenne, or Fort Laramie to get into the Black Hills.

It has now transpired that "three Indians" were not killed, or any Indians in the region of Fort Pierre, or any Indians east of the Black Hills, by persons going there, as stated to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs by the Cheyenne agent, and that the agent was misinformed in relation thereto, or he willfully wrote to the Commissioner what was not true, which latter I hesitate to believe. But, believing in the good intentions of those who administer this Government and their desire to strictly mete out justice to all, I do not hesitate to say that I believe, when the facts in this regard are known to them as I know them, that the order closing the Fort Pierre route will be revoked, or another made closing those from the Union Pacific Railroad. With either we shall be content.

To the unsophisticated these last remarks of mine might seem to be aliunde, and not pertinent to the issue; but when it is understood that all the facts which surround this reservation should be properly considered before coming to a determination in the premises, and that Dakotaians and others east of us who have "traveled that way," have had not only a fire in front but a "fire in the rear," it is a matter of absolute necessity, in order to have ample justice done us, to state the whole case as it really exists, "without fear, favor, or affection."

RESULTS ON THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL.

A bill has recently passed the Senate "providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes," which has been transmitted to this House and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, "that bourn whence" it takes a long while to get back, à la other committees.

As a dernier ressort, I am in favor of this Senate bill, but it will take a long while, if it passes this session, to be of any utility to us, as the commissioners authorized thereby cannot report a treaty, for want of time, until the next session of this Congress; therefore it will be nearly a year before we can reap any benefit therefrom.

We are told to wait until a different policy or new treaties may enable these Indians to quietly vacate this valuable country; but Young America never waits. It is not the nature of the people of these United States to hesitate to strike the blow when the iron is hot.

Remove this dusky cloud title from a portion of the reservation, and thousand of emigrants will flock there annually; not simply as gold-hunters, but as farmers and tillers of the soil. The climate is temperate and salubrious; the soil is rich; forests abound, and the country is well supplied with small streams abounding in fish. There is no portion of the country that presents so many attractions for the emigrants as this bill proposes to open. The passage of this bill will do the Indian no harm, but will greatly advantage the hardy, whole-souled, generous-hearted pioneers. Pass this bill and this rich country is open for exploration and settlement at once, and gives homes to thousands of the homeless. The interests of humanity demand its passage. It will stop the shedding of innocent blood. Men and women will earn their daily bread in quiet, and after the labors of the day lay down to sleep without fear of being awakened by the yell of the bloodthirsty savage or the glare of the midnight conflagration. The sword will be turned into the plowshare, and "the song of the turtle will be heard in the land."

Christianity demands that these lands shall be occupied and possessed by those who believe in protecting one another, instead of those who only delight in slaying pale-faces. The American people, yes, the civilized world, is tired of this sentimental policy for the "poor Indian," which has almost made a continuous graveyard from the Ohio River to the Pacific Ocean.

The time has arrived when people are not to be deceived by well-rounded sentences, poetical effusions, or charming fictions. Desolated homes, thousands of widows and orphans cry out that these murderers must leave these lands to the quiet possession of those who are able and willing to assist the earth in giving forth its increase and establishing homes where they can enjoy the sweet comforts of peace and family, and "where the wicked Indian will cease from troubling" and the weary laborer reap the rich rewards of his toil in the possession of a secure home and contented family.

POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, addressed the House in relation to the postal service of the Government. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

CITIZENSHIP—NATURALIZATION.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, early this session a bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes. That bill has been reported favorably by that committee and made a special order.

I consider it my duty to oppose the bill and to state some of the reasons which compel me to do so. It professes to be a bill to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship, and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries. It might more appropriately be styled a bill to provide an easy and speedy mode to convert citizens of the United States in foreign countries into aliens and deprive them of American rights and liberties. I am sure the distinguished jurist and statesman who has charge of this bill does not see it in this light or he would be the last man to propose it and enforce with his eloquence and authority its passage.

The fourteenth amendment is a grand and clear enunciation by the American people of the persons who are entitled to citizenship. It ordains that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside

It annihilates creed, nativity, class, and color, and embraces in the vast brotherhood of American citizenship all born within the United States and all, wherever born, who love freedom and record an oath to defend and uphold it. All naturalized persons are citizens, and all persons born in the United States, whether in a State or Territory or the District of Columbia, are citizens.

Before this amendment it was doubted whether any one could be a citizen of the United States who was not a citizen of some one of the States, and it was asserted by high and reverend authorities that you could only enter into the august incorporation of United States citizenship through the citizenship of a State. It was the States that formed and entered the Union, and only those were citizens of the Union which the States carried into it clothed with the character of State citizenship. The individual had no access to citizenship of the Union except as invested with the citizenship of some one of the representative sovereign republics that composed the Union. Hence colored people, who were not considered citizens of any State, were decided not to be citizens of the United States, and the same doctrine was applied to persons resident in the District of Columbia or in any of the Territories. The amendment removes all these difficulties, and declares that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction shall be citizens of the United States." It goes further, and clothes the citizen of the United States with the citizenship of whatever State he may reside in. It not only declares who are citizens of the United States, but accompanies those citizens into the several States and makes each one a citizen also of the State in which he resides. It is no longer in the power of a State to exclude from its full and equal citizenship a citizen of the United States who may reside within it. Birth or naturalization creates the citizen of the United States, and residence within a State superadds, by force of the amendment, citizenship of that State.

Prior to the amendment a citizen of one State was entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in each of the several States. A citizen of a State was secured an equality of privilege with the citizens of any other State he chose to move into or reside in and this was a powerful provision to make the people of the several States one people and elevate them all to the high plane of a broad national character. But it only applied to the citizens of each State. Those who were not citizens of any State were not included in that clause of the Constitution. But the fourteenth amendment takes a broader and higher sweep, widens the field of United States citizenship, and carries its rights of equality into all the States. Not citizenship of a State only, but citizenship of the United States and residence in another State, makes you a citizen of such State and entitles you to all the privileges and immunities enjoyed by any other citizen of such State. Birth and naturalization are the only qualifications for citizenship of the United States; but, to be a citizen of a State, residence within it is superadded.

The power of the State is local, limited to her own territory. She has no duty of protection beyond it. Therefore citizenship of a State is local, and only endures while residence within her territory continues. State citizenship depends upon State residence. But citizenship of the United States is in no manner limited by or dependent upon residence. The United States, for the benefit of all the States, is clothed with all the great national powers which any government or people can possess. Among the nations of the earth her powers as a nation are equal to those of any of them. For all the great external purposes for which the Government was established citizens of the United States are one people, with one common country, possessed of all the powers for the protection of its citizens which any people possesses. The United States is one of the great nations of the world, and is a party to all the laws that rule the nations of the world in their relations to each other.

Citizenship of the United States is not local, not limited by territorial residence within the United States, and not cast off by leaving the mere physical limits of the United States. As the power, influence, and jurisdiction of the United States in international relations and affairs extend over all the seas and through every land, so her citizenship is universal and clings with all its protecting influence to her citizens into whatsoever part of the world they may go. Birth and naturalization in the United States are the tests of citizenship; no other element disturbs the proposition; no complicated questions of domicile or residence mingle with it or confuse it. If born in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction or if naturalized in the United States, the great charter of American liberty exalts you to its citizenship, and no power or authority can detract from this title or superadd other elements or conditions not required by that august instrument, which is itself the glorious outgrowth of centuries of toil and struggle and sacrifice of the wisest, best, and bravest of the races of mankind. For though it grew up and took form and shape in a day, as it were, the materials of which it is composed, the foundations and the superstructure, were selected and gathered from all parts of the civilized world and were the slow and laborious product of ages. The rights which it confers and secures must be maintained for the individual as well as for the multitude.

Citizenship must not be dwarfed or shorn of its protection by paltry, unmanly legislation, unworthy of the great principles of freedom and national spirit which created and have since upheld the Constitution. It nowhere makes continued residence an element of citizenship. It is true the Constitution says in regard to the citizens, born within the United States that they must be "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" at the time of their birth; but it is well known, and has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, that this qualification was inserted to exclude from citizenship the children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States, and Indians while remaining in their tribal relations; and this provision affords no countenance whatever to the view that persons who have undoubted citizenship by birth or naturalization are liable to forfeit it by going into a foreign country and remaining there some indefinite time, whether for business, culture, or pleasure. The Constitution has molded the whole American people into one of the great powers of the world and secures to its citizens, as a part of their fundamental liberties, the right to travel into foreign countries and to have passports and freedom for travel and protection on sea and land against the wrongful interference of any power whatever. Wherever he lawfully goes he carries with him the ægis of American liberties and the inviolable protection of the powerful Republic of which he is a member. But the bill under consideration contravenes the Constitution and undertakes to limit citizenship by home residence and to hamper the right to travel into foreign countries for any purpose with odious, inquisitorial restrictions, and to make the enjoyment of this undoubted, inestimable right dangerous to citizenship itself.

The Constitution encourages the development of freedom, manhood, commerce, travel, and intercommunion with the nations and peoples of all the world. But the bill restricts all these, and only tolerates them under the humiliation of degrading espionage or the confiscation of citizenship itself. It permits the citizen to go abroad, but his country's protection in all the amplitude of its majestic power must not accompany him. The great bond which unites him in the glorious brotherhood of American citizenship, and should ennoble his manhood by its assured protection in all parts of the world and against all the powers of the world, is rapidly dissolving away by the very act of departing from the shores of the United States. If he remains two years domiciled elsewhere, for any purpose or for any cause, his American liberties are lost and he becomes an outcast from the great society of American freemen, unless he has subjected himself to the humiliation of registering at some consulate the private history in minute detail of himself and his family.

How free, grand, august, is the Constitution! No belittling espionage, no unworthy fears, no prison bounds as the condition of its all-powerful and omnipresent protection. When it has crowned you with the sovereign royalty of its citizenship it does not chain you down as a serf to the soil. It does not degrade in the act of ennobling or belittle while making you great. But this bill, following the example of the ignoble surrender made of our German naturalized citizens by the treaty of 1868, comes in, a hundred years after the banners of liberty have been set afloat over the vast plains and the majestic mountains of our country, a hundred years after the mighty spirit of the Constitution has been abroad through the land, educating, enlarging, and elevating the aspirations of the people to a broader, higher, and more generous nationality than ever animated the hearts of any other people—this bill comes into the American Congress and in feeble and degenerate breath attempts to paralyze the powers of the Constitution and confine its protection to those citizens who remain at home and need it least.

By this bill, if a native or naturalized citizen goes abroad and fails to undergo the inquisitorial process prescribed and remains two years in any foreign country, he forfeits all claim to the protecting power of the United States. American citizenship is made to depend not upon the plain and solid language of the Constitution but upon the uncertain and irreconcilable opinions of the officials of the foreign country as to what constitutes residence or domicile. The bill confounds both these terms as meaning the same thing, although they differ from each other, and each differs from itself. Thus a commercial domicile, a matrimonial domicile, a political domicile, and a testamentary domicile may each differ from the other inessential elements, and the difference between residence and domicile is still greater than the difference between one sort of domicile and another. The bill endeavors to remedy these difficulties by declaring that domicile and residence are to be construed as implying a fixed residence at a particular place with direct or presumptive proof of an intent to remain indefinitely.

But a fixed residence means no more than residence, and what constitutes residence must remain as doubtful and unsettled in law with the word "fixed" before it as without it. And the direct or presumptive proof required to establish the fixed residence which is to destroy American citizenship is furnished to the foreign government in the strongest terms by the provision of the bill which declares that "citizens of the United States who shall remain out of the jurisdiction of the United States and within the jurisdiction of some other power continuously for two years shall be held as domiciled in a foreign country, except as hereinbefore provided;" that is, except those who comply with the odious inquisitorial injunctions of the bill and register the private history of themselves and families at some legation or consulate of the United States. The law is imperative, and leaves no presumption in favor of American citizenship. Two years within a foreign country without registry "shall be held" to denationalize the American citizen and strip off the glorious heritage of American liberties, without any allowance for the inconvenience or even impossibility of his going to the place of registry.

The blood-bought charter of his country clothes him with the ennobling character of an American citizen in words of light and power, but this degenerate law makes the high privilege hang upon all the uncertainties and contradictions that embarrass questions of residence and domicile in commercial, testamentary, and political law and casts forth American citizenship as a football and plaything for the lawyers, diplomats, and petty officials of foreign governments. The American Congress would descend far below the majestic spirit of the Constitution if it should ever consent to place in such doubt and peril the glorious prerogatives of American citizenship which our countrymen proudly carry with them through whatever parts of the habitable globe their daring enterprise or enlightened curiosity may conduct them. The American people are great, powerful, and magnanimous enough to follow, to accompany, and clothe with their inviolable protection the humblest of their fellow-citizens in the remotest quarters of the world.

The great object of the Constitution was to unite and build up all the American people into one generous and powerful nation so far as regards all foreign countries and to protect each member of that nationality while abroad in all his lawful pursuits against the separate or combined powers of all the world. The American people are not willing to abdicate the Constitution and descend from the exalted position to which it has elevated them. One of the most valuable rights of American citizens as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States and by all our jurists and statesmen, is to have passports and freedom for travel in foreign countries and the protection of the whole American people while abroad. The spirit of the Constitution encourages and develops trade and commerce and friendly intercourse with foreign nations. And the law now is the same as when the Constitution was formed, that no length of absence abroad deprives the citizen of the protection of his Government. This principle of public law entered into and made a part of the Constitution. The destruction of American citizenship by two years' residence abroad and non-registration is an innovation upon the spirit of the Constitution that now seeks in this centennial year to erect itself into a monument of American degeneracy.

The German treaty of 1868 was bad enough, but this bill embraces all citizens and hastens to abandon them as soon as they go abroad, by furnishing numerous odious requirements, non-compliance with which converts them against their will into aliens.

The treaty of 1868, by which naturalized citizens of German birth who return for any purpose to their native country and remain there two years are surrendered to the German Empire and deprived of their American character, was an utter abandonment of the American doctrine, always announced and upheld at every cost by the democratic party, that when a naturalized citizen revisited his native country he entered it as an American citizen entitled to the same protection from the United States as if he were a native-born citizen. The treaty made an illegal and disparaging distinction between the naturalized citizen of German birth and the naturalized citizens of other origin, or the native-born citizen. We have no better class of citizens than those of German birth. Their honest, laborious, untiring industry has cut down the forests, bridged the streams, cultivated the wilderness, and carried peaceful and prosperous settlements, blessed with law, order, and abundance, from the eastern slopes away over the mountains and across the valleys to the westernmost boundaries of our vast domains. They have borne their ample share, whether in peace or in war, in the great work of building up, enriching, strengthening, and developing into power and greatness the American Republic. Why should these citizens have a mark of disparagement set upon them by any act or treaty of the United States? Yet such is the treaty referred to, that they alone of all classes of our citizens, if they visit the land of their birth to see their kindred or friends, to pursue business or pleasure, and remain there more than two years, are stripped of their American citizenship and American liberties and cast back to the relentless rule of the country which they had renounced. The Supreme Court says, (Osborne vs. Bank of United States, 9 Wheaton,) speaking of a naturalized citizen:

> He becomes a member of the society, possessing all the rights of a native citizen and standing in view of the Constitution on the footing of a native.

Yet in the face of the Constitution, which proclaims the equal rights of all classes of citizens, native and naturalized, a republican Administration negotiated a treaty singling out the naturalized German citizen from all others and placing a mark of inferiority upon him, and agreeing to abandon him helpless and defenseless if he returned to his native country and remained over two years in it. This was contrary to the fair, just, and equal spirit of the Constitution, which knows no distinction of citizens and accompanies them all alike with its sheltering and protecting power at home and abroad. It is a grave question whether that treaty was not also contrary to the letter of the Constitution, which confers upon Congress the power of establishing a uniform system of naturalization, but nowhere gives to Congress or the treaty-making power any authority to discriminate between different classes of citizens or abridge or diminish the rights of one class below those of another. A treaty is the supreme law of the land; but there must be some fundamental limits as to the objects which fall within the scope of the treaty-making power.

What all three branches of the Government have no power to accomplish, two of these branches—the President and the Senate—should not in reason be competent to effect. Certainly Congress could not pass any law affecting citizenship but a uniform one, acting upon all alike. It could not pass a law abridging the rights of German-born citizens as distinguished from citizens born here or elsewhere. And it must be very dangerous doctrine to admit that the President and Senate in making a treaty can cripple the functions of any other branch of the Government, or of all three branches combined, or select out certain classes of citizens and reduce them to an inferior degree of protection at home or abroad. If this doctrine be admitted, we may in time have to look for the rights of our citizens, not to the Constitution of our country, but to the different treaties with foreign powers which may strip one class of citizens of the protection of the Government upon one ground, and others upon entirely different grounds.

Citizenship of the United States is measured only by the Constitution, and every citizen has full and equal right to all its powers and protection. There cannot be one measure of protection for one and another for another. I regard the principle of these treaties as a pernicious innovation, which should never receive the sanction of the American people, but which, on the contrary, should be marked with their indignant disapprobation to prevent it from growing into a precedent. In the early days of the Republic, under democratic statesmanship, which nursed and developed the Constitution in harmonious co-ordination of all its powers and functions, the American people did not hesitate to declare war against the British government to vindicate the principle that the naturalized citizen possessed all the rights of the native-born, and that his return within British jurisdiction did not subject him to any service or allegiance which he originally owed to it as the country of his birth.

Such was the heroic spirit of the Republic while only in its infancy. And now, when largely aided by emigration it has grown up to be the foremost power of the earth and the great reserved sanctuary of human freedom, bright all over with the glories of the past and flushed and throbbing with the gorgeous visions of the still more glorious future, how abject must that spirit be, how false to the history and traditions of its brief but splendid career, which would consent to surrender in the noonday of its power one jot or tittle of those American liberties which crown its citizenship above that of all other nations, and for the firm establishment of which it cheerfully offered the blood of its children while yet in the weakness of its early youth.

Where is the great American spirit of Jackson, who immortalized not his own name only but that of his country by the victory of New Orleans which established upon the mortifying defeat of the British government, and should have consecrated forever in American law, the principle that the naturalized citizen of the United States will be protected at all cost and hazard against the claims of the country of his birth whenever he goes there lawfully and peaceably? This principle, sanctified by the blood of heroes, has been abandoned in the case of naturalized German citizens. The spirit of Jackson and his compatriots sleeps. The times are degenerate. American citizenship is bartered away by treaty, and no voice arouses the patriotism of the land. How long shall we hope for the rekindling of the ancient fires? How long before the spirits of the mighty dead shall awake and walk abroad among the people rousing them up as in times of old to union, harmony, and fraternal love at home, and to bold and heroic assertion and maintenance of national and individual right abroad?

This bill not only requires the democratic Representatives of the American people to sanction this German treaty by making it the basis of legislation proposed in the bill, but goes further and extends the principle of the treaty to all our citizens, whether native or foreign born, and places all alike in peril of losing their American citizenship whenever they go abroad. If they remain two years in any foreign country without subjecting themselves to the inquisitorial registration required by the bill, they forfeit their citizenship and are thereby denationalized and cast out upon the world as unprotected aliens, to be dealt with as the countries in which they happen to be may choose. In order that a person may save himself from the forfeiture of his American citizenship he is bound, whether native or naturalized, to register at some United States legation his name, place, and date of birth, time and place of naturalization, previous domicile in the United States and the duration of his absence from it; whether he intends to return to it; if married, the name and nationality of his wife and children, and the names and ages of his minor children, with the dates and places of their birth. If he remains out of the jurisdiction of the United States continuously for two years, he shall be held as domiciled in the foreign country, and thus deprived of his citizenship. Such legislation finds no support in reason or necessity, and is utterly and scornfully repudiated by every sentiment of a generous and all-protecting American nationality, and such an abasement of American spirit should find no place on our statute-book. Under the right of expatriation an American citizen may renounce his allegiance and become a citizen of a foreign government. But this should be his own free and voluntary act, done for that purpose and with that intent. He has a constitutional right to go abroad and remain there in time of peace, and no penalties or criminal presumptions should be attached by law or treaty to the exercise of this acknowledged right.

That part of the bill which relates to minor children is wholly useless. The Constitution itself declares that a child born within the United States of parents who are not citizens and not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States is an alien. It is therefore useless to enact it in a statute. The existing law also provides that if the father naturalizes or declares his intention and dies, it naturalizes the mother and minor children, which is all that is required. The existing law provides, too, that children born out of the jurisdiction of the United States of fathers who are citizens of the United States shall be citizens of the United States. (Revised Statutes, section 1993.) This legislation sufficiently covers the case of both classes of minor children, and the legislation proposed in the bill could only create embarrassment and complication.

The paragraph in the bill relating to married women introduces another unwarrantable novelty into the law of American citizenship. If an American lady marries a citizen of another government, this bill ipso facto strips her of her American citizenship and makes her an alien in the home of her fathers, who may have been among the boldest and wisest in establishing the liberties of that country, from all participation in the glorious privileges of which she is made an outcast by an honorable marriage. I abhor such a law, and am unable to conceive of the possibility of its ever receiving the sanction of the American people. Why should ladies of America be prevented from marrying the men of their choice under penalty of renouncing the heritage of their fathers and becoming aliens to the country of their birth? Many American ladies have married gentlemen of foreign birth, and own large landed estates and other property in the United States, and why should they lose their American citizenship for the sacred right of marrying those they love? The marriages of American ladies to citizens of other countries, and even their residence in those countries, have produced untold good to the people of the United States. Every fair daughter of America who goes abroad as the wife of a foreigner becomes a missionary of peace and of social and friendly intercourse between her native country and that of her husband. Her marriage should not deprive her of her American character of citizenship; and there is no need for the provision in the bill restoring her to citizenship on the death of her husband by filing in the Department of State a declaration of her election to become such citizen. This feature of allowing the Department of State to officiate in the conferring of citizenship is another of the objectionable novelties of this bill, and it is in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which places the exclusive power of conferring citizenship, and prescribing the terms and conditions upon which it shall be conferred, in Congress alone.

Another noticeable feature of the bill in the enumeration of persons entitled to protection as American citizens is its total omission of ladies of foreign birth who have married American citizens. The act of 1855 (section 1994 of the Revised Statutes) provides that any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen of the United States. This law makes an alien woman who marries a citizen of the United States a citizen also. Her marriage naturalizes her, and makes her as much a citizen as if she were a native-born.

But this bill, while undertaking to define who are American citizens and entitled to the protection of the United States, totally ignores these ladies, who under existing law are as fully entitled to the character and protection of American citizens as any other class of citizens.

That part of the bill which deprives of American citizenship native or naturalized citizens who enter into the civil, military, or naval service of any foreign prince, or people, or state, while such service continues, or who are naturalized as subjects or citizens of a foreign state, is right, and is the only part of the bill which is worthy of support. The substitute of the gentleman from New York embraces this feature of the bill, and cuts off all the other crude and non-American-like matter which the bill seeks to have enacted into law. There is one defect, I think, in the proviso to the substitute which ought to be corrected by an amendment, and to which I have no doubt the gentleman from New York will consent when his attention is called to it. It says that a citizen of the United States, having become the wife of an alien, may on the death of her husband again become a citizen of the United States by going before any court of record, &c., and proving her citizenship before marriage and the death of her alien husband, and making a declaration of intention to again become a citizen of the United States. The error of this proviso, I conceive, consists in this, that it assumes that the marriage of an American lady to an alien ipso facto strips her of her American citizenship. This is not and should not be the law. If a lady marries an alien and resides in the United States with her alien husband, she still remains an American citizen, notwithstanding her marriage, and should so remain. There is no reason why an American lady, marrying an alien and continuing to live in the United States, owning property in the United States, paying taxes and bearing all the burdens of any other citizen, should cease to be a citizen of the United States. A native-born citizen of the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction and authority, should not be divested of her citizenship by the mere fact of her marrying an alien. That would set up a new and unwarrantable obstacle to marriage. There is no authority in the Constitution for depriving an American lady of her citizenship by the mere fact of her marriage to an alien. If she and her alien husband reside in the United States, she does and should remain a citizen after the marriage as fully as before it. It is only in the case of her abandoning the United States and making her permanent home in the country and with the people of her husband that she should lose her American character and be required to naturalize on her return to this country after the death of her husband.

CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, addressed the House on the state of the Union generally. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I rise as a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals to say that I believe the bill as now amended to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway ought to receive the approval of the House. It grants no subsidies.

The company ask the right to construct a narrow-gauge railroad from the great grain-growing districts of the country to tide-water at Alexandria, where they have secured half a mile of frontage on a harbor with a depth of over thirty feet of water, capable of floating the largest ships and steamers in the world, and also a branch to Washington.

The great seaports of Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore have their trunk lines leading to the West, carrying comforts and blessings and developing the resources of the country through which they run.

Why should not Alexandria, Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile also have their lines of railroad to the West, developing the great resources of the States through which they would pass and tapping new sections of our western country where they are crying out for cheap transportation to tide-water? I would be glad to see such lines established, because they would unlock the mines of coal, iron, and other minerals of the mountains of Virginia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and place those States beside the great State of Pennsylvania in wealth and population. Such lines of railway transportation would also harness the waterfalls of those States to manufactories of iron, cotton, and wool, and enable their citizens to vie with the people of New England in the blessings of skilled labor, wealth, and popular education. The development of these industries never lessens the prosperity of the rich man, but is sure to elevate and better the condition of the poor man.

I want to see more railroads in the Southern States for the development of their magnificent resources. I want to see more railroads between the North and the South, more means of communication of all kinds between the two sections, for I am convinced that freer intercourse and a better acquaintance are essential to the true unity of our people.

Let the young men of the North, who have been educated to till the soil in the most skillful manner, and those who have learned to conduct our machine-shops and factories, and those who have been educated in our banking-houses and mercantile establishments—I say let representative young men of all these classes go to the Southern States and select from the beautiful daughters of the South their companions for life, and then let them settle at the North or the South, as their tastes or inclinations may decide. Let their relatives of the South visit the homes of the North, and let their friends of the North visit the homes of the South, and they shall find that they all read the same Bible; that they all look up to and call blessings down from the same Heavenly Father; they all enjoy the protection of the same dear old flag, the Stars and Stripes.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Massachusetts do not believe in a nobility of family or wealth merely, but they do believe in a nobility of nature, of culture, of discipline, and of labor; they also believe in the right of the humblest citizen in the land to express his opinions freely and vote as he pleases.

Whatever benefits have come to our people through the adoption of these sentiments I would be glad to see extended throughout the length and breadth of our land. Let these principles be adopted, and success and prosperity would be everywhere apparent.

I would like to have more railroads built to connect the North and the South, the East and the West, and cement our business relations more closely; but I value still more highly those ties of family and religion and education which are sure to make us one people, as God intended we should be.

GENEVA AWARD, ETC.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make a few remarks to-night upon the bill nominally before the House, the bill for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award; and I came up this evening for that purpose, for I understood that was to be the only subject of discussion to-night. I find, somewhat to my surprise, that the discussion here has embraced a somewhat wider range of subjects than perhaps was anticipated by the gentleman who has the Geneva award bill in charge, [Mr. LORD.]

I am very much surprised to see so very few members of the House in attendance when a subject of such vast importance to the people of the United States is presented for consideration, especially when such opposite propositions have been presented by gentlemen on this floor. On the one side it is claimed that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to place in the Treasury all the remaining money received by virtue of the Geneva award, and that the Government may use it for its own purposes, irrespective of any claim whatever. On the other side it is urged that, the Government having paid all proper claims presented, the balance of the fund should be returned to the nation from which we received it. I will not to-night discuss these two propositions, mainly because there is such a thin attendance of members, and I should be very sorry to have my views wasted upon so few.

Under the head of the Geneva award, the discussion this evening has embraced a very learned dissertation, by a gentleman well skilled in that branch of the public service, upon the postal service of the United States. I think I pay no more than a just compliment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] when I say that, not of all the members elected to the House, but of the twenty-two that are present here to-night, he is more familiar with the postal service of the United States than any other gentleman, a compliment well deserved, and one which I make with a great deal of satisfaction. Another gentleman, [Mr. WALSH,] under the same heading of the Geneva award, has discussed the naturalization laws of the United States. Another gentleman [Mr. KIDDER] has given us a very exhaustive speech upon the subject of the settlement of the Black Hills and the Sioux treaty. Still another gentleman, [Mr. FROST,] with that practical judgment which always attaches to the sons of New England, has brought forward the subject of narrow-gauge railroads to the remote rural districts of the West.

Therefore the time this evening has not been entirely lost. Valuable information has been furnished to those of us who are present upon a variety of subjects. And this information, perhaps, is as intimately connected with the bill under consideration as the discussions of this House usually are connected with the questions nominally before it. And I am free to say—and I hope gentlemen who are not present, reading my remarks in the RECORD to-morrow, will notice it—I am free to say that the paucity of numbers here rather adds to the sharpness and brightness of the discourses which are delivered before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a subject connected with the Geneva award, and with the action of the House upon it, to which I desire for a moment to call the attention of members present. Why is it that a subject which not only in this Congress but in a former Congress has received for months the consideration of the Judiciary Committee, which has received the acute, earnest investigation of the distinguished chairman of that committee, till the subject has been reduced to a practical form and presented here in a proper manner—why is it that it receives no more attention from this House? Why is it that it calls here on this last evening of its discussion only twenty-two members of the House?

Sir, the fact is that the members of this House are too unwell, too much afflicted from causes which I will presently mention, to be able to come here this evening; and when I assure the House that, according to my information, from thirty-seven to fifty-seven members—ranging anywhere between those numbers—are rendered ill and unable to attend evening sessions because they have been compelled for several weeks, in this extreme hot weather, to cool their parched lips with iced Potomac water only, [laughter,] the House will understand the importance of this paragraph which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read

The Clerk read as follows:

ECONOMY ON THE HOUSE SIDE OF THE CAPITOL.

Before "Uncle Jimmy" WILLIAMS was made chairman of the House Committee of Accounts it was customary on such seething days as these which have now come upon us to quench the congressional thirst with lemonade and iced tea. These exhilarating beverages were paid for out of the contingent fund of the House. Mr. WILLIAMS, however, will hear of no such extravagance, and listen to no appeals in this direction to deplete the public purse, and, as a sequence, the machine has been run thus far on ice-water and the contents of private flasks. To illustrate how this economy works an example of to-day is cited. A member from Pennsylvania who "holds the purse-strings of the nation" had been holding conversation with a number of his colleagues. Abruptly he left them. "Where are you going?" said one of them, as he headed toward the door. "I am going over to the Senate to get some lemonade. Blue-jean WILLIAMS is so mean he won't let us have any on our side of the Capitol." So Peter is robbed to pay Paul. Just as much lemonade is used and the expense of making it is as great as ever, the exception being that the Senate foots the bills. The House calls this economy, but the tax burden on the people for lemons and sugar is about the same that it was before the era of economy "set in."

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to state to the House whether the reporter who gave that paragraph to the newspapers was strictly accurate in the statement or not. From many years' observation I have learned that the reporters of this House and for the press are remarkably accurate; and the presumption therefore is very strong to my mind that there is accuracy in this report. If it be so, or whether it be so or not, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will pardon me for calling his attention to this subject and submitting to him a suggestion. This money, which has been captured from the greatest maritime and most warlike nation of the earth, has been brought within sight of the doors of our own Treasury, yet not in the Treasury, and is held there with guards around it, watching it by day and by night, at an additional expense, and an unnecessary expense perhaps. This fund is causing great anxiety not only in the minds of the Judiciary Committee and their chairman as to what shall become of it, but great anxiety also in the minds of its immediate keepers and watchmen. Now with that friendly feeling which I have always entertained for the chairman, and which could only have been heightened by a more intimate acquaintance than I regret to say I have, I suggest to him whether it is not within the rule of international law, whether it does not come within proper parliamentary practice that in the distribution of this fund for which there are no claimants—which in our eagerness to grapple with the British lion we have perhaps received to a larger extent than we deserved—whether, with a due regard to the feelings not only of this nation and of the nation from which we captured this fund, but in view of the whole civilized world, it may not be proper to appropriate from this fifteen-million-dollar fund, when it is denied that it belongs to anybody upon God's footstool, a small portion of it for iced tea and lemonade? [Great laughter.]

The occasion, sir, is trivial I know; compared with the grandeur of that grand commission of arbitration it is trivial. But, sir, when we reflect that all but two score of the members of this House are to-night writhing from the effects of too much iced Potomac, unable to come here in these last days of the session and perform the high legislative functions of the nation, leaving this most important of all the outside financial questions undiscussed and undisposed of, I submit that I am not asking too much when I suggest to the chairman to amend his bill and permit a small fraction of that grand fifteen-million-dollar fund, now uncalled for and about which there is so much dispute, to be appropriated for iced tea and lemonade. [Laughter.] Save the disquieted feelings which must disturb the Committee on Accounts. Save—if it be possible to hope for such a salvation—save the leaders of the House from pilfering from the Senate, if the report which has been read be true. Provide that out of that fund this House may receive that pittance which shall enable it to supply the necessary wants of its members, without either playing "Dick Smith" on the Senate or leaving so many of our members confined to their rooms by sickness resulting from drinking iced Potomac.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. LANE.) The Chair presumes that the gentleman used the word "pilfering" in a Pickwickian sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I will modify my language and simply say "borrowing." [Laughter.] I ask that the reporters may be permitted to make that change. And I thank the Chair for the suggestion. It is not the first time in my life when the suggestion of a friend has saved me from subsequent embarrassment.

Now, sir, I have said perhaps all that I ought to have said—probably more—on this solemn and interesting occasion. [Laughter.] I have performed a duty which more properly belonged to the other side of the House. [Renewed laughter.] I have endeavored to point out a way by which we can secure the health of the members without drawing upon a depleted Treasury. I submit this to my friend the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I invoke for this proposition the cordial support of all right-thinking men in this House. And, Mr. Speaker, if it shall be found that any portion of this fund can be appropriated in this manner, I shall feel—as I have heretofore ranked myself so thoroughly on the side of retrenchment and reform, that I have been unwilling to move in this House for even the small amount from the public Treasury necessary to procure what might restore health to members here—that I have at least pointed out the way by which a remedy may be found without depleting the public Treasury, leaving my record and the record of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, and the record of the whole House still as high, as exalted, and as noble in the estimation of the whole country as it has heretofore during this tedious session proved itself to be.

And then, on motion of Mr. LORD, (at nine o'clock and seven minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CONGER: The petition of Colonel J. H. Kidd, Captain H. K. White, Major C. P. Dake, and 21 other officers of the Michigan Volunteers, that the charge of desertion against ten privates of the First Michigan Cavalry be removed, said privates having enlisted, as they believed, only during the war, and having left said regiment when the war was over, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Des Moines Valley, Iowa, that Congress request the United States Supreme Court to issue a special mandate to the Federal courts in Iowa to postpone all action in reference to the Des Moines River lands, awaiting the action of Congress upon certain memorials in regard to said lands, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, memorial of Clarissa A. Chamberlin, for an extension of patent for improvement of shovels, to the Committee on Patents.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 30, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. INGALLS. As the Journal this morning is very long, unless there is some special reason why it should be read, I move that its further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is scarcely anybody here yet, and I think it had better be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to dispensing with the reading of the Journal, and it will be resumed.

The Secretary continued the reading of the Journal, and was interrupted by Mr. EDMUNDS. As this is the last day of the fiscal year, although I do not think we ought to do this thing usually, I withdraw my objection to dispensing with the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with.

DISTRICT POLICE FORCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the police commissioners of the District of Columbia, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 26th instant, calling for the names of the men appointed on the police force of the District since the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, transmitting a report showing that of the one hundred and thirty-seven persons appointed all have served either in the Army or Navy, except fifty-six; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate yesterday further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House on the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and agreed to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives, and the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee of conference on the part of the Senate. The Chair appoints the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. WEST; the Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN; and the Senator from Texas, Mr. MAXEY.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARVEY presented a petition of citizens of Baxter Springs, Kansas, on behalf of David Allen, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment, Kansas Cavalry, praying the correction of his Army record by the removal of the charge of desertion therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] reminds us that this is the last day of the fiscal year. There is one branch of the public service which will fall, I suppose, with the dead lock that seems to be inevitable in twelve hours, which is so intimately connected with the two Houses of Congress that it is difficult to understand how we can transact our business without it. Certainly we cannot do so with any sort of convenience. I refer to the public printing. The Congressional Printer has asked of the Committee on Printing what his obligation will be with regard to fulfilling the orders which he may receive from the Senate and the House of Representatives after twelve o'clock to-night. I believe the law is very plain. I am not a lawyer, and I should not be willing to follow my own legal opinion, much less to prescribe it for anybody else; but I believe the law is perfectly plain that every appropriation falls into the Treasury at twelve o'clock to-night and that no officer is allowed to apply any money except under the permanent appropriations (in which the public printing is not included) for any service rendered after that time. It would subject us to very great inconvenience and interrupt our business almost entirely if the operations of the Printing Office were stopped. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing was read three times, and passed. It authorizes the Congressional Printer to continue the work required by law in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made, and that its provisions shall continue in force for sixty days.

TREATY WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, to report it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As this bill relates entirely to a change of the tariff, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether it ought not to be submitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I cannot see any good to result from that. The bill has just come from a committee where the whole subject has been investigated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know that; but this is a question which concerns finance exclusively. If it was a matter of treaty alone, I should not ask to have it referred to the Committee on Finance; but, as it is to carry out the terms of a treaty and relates to the tariff and the tariff alone, I think it is a subject that ought to have been submitted to that committee in the first place. Therefore it would not delay but, I think, forward the business to have it considered by the Committee on Finance. I think the subject ought to be thoroughly examined.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope this bill will not be referred to the Committee on Finance. There might have been an argument in that behalf in the early part of the session on the first reference; but as the bill has been before so important a committee as the Committee on Foreign Relations and has been considered carefully and at length, fully investigated, and is now reported from that committee by the chairman, it appears to me that it is scarcely necessary to refer it to the Committee on Finance, and more especially as it is so late in the session that there will scarcely be any probability that it will be again reported to the Senate. It is of importance, it appears to me, that there should be action upon this bill at the present session. I hope, therefore, the bill will not be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I had noticed that this bill, in the first place, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I thought it was an erroneous reference to begin with; but I did not suppose that anybody would object to a change of reference when it should be reported. I thought most likely that committee would report the bill and ask to have it referred to the Committee on Finance. Certainly the Committee on Finance are altogether more familiar with the subject embraced in this bill than the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I do not think it would retard its passage at all, but facilitate it, to have it considered by a committee that will know more accurately whether the provisions are what they ought to be in a bill which if it is to pass would affect our revenue so largely.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is nothing intricate about this subject. The only object of the bill, if I understand it, is to adjust the revenues according to the terms of the existing treaty, and certainly no questions of finance are to be determined. It is simply an adjustment of the law to the terms of the treaty. I certainly cannot see the necessity of referring it to the Committee on Finance, and hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the reference of the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

MAILING OF OBSCENE BOOKS AND LOTTERY CIRCULARS.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I probably shall be necessarily absent from the Senate most of the day, I ask to be indulged in calling up at this time House bill No. 2575. It will consume but very little time, I think. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books and other matters therein contained and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails. It amends section 3893 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

Every obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture-paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, and every article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, and every article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use, and every written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or of whom, or by what means, any of the hereinbefore-mentioned matters, articles, or things may be obtained or made, and every letter upon the envelope of which, or postal card upon which, indecent, lewd, obscene, or lascivious delineations, epithets, terms, or language may be written or printed, are hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office, nor by any letter-carrier; and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section to be non-mailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same, or cause the same to be taken, from the mails, for the purpose of circulating or disposing of, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition of the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less that one year nor more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

It further provides that all offenses heretofore committed under the original section 3893 of the Revised Statutes may be prosecuted and punished under that section in the same manner and with the same effect as if the act had not been passed.

Section 2 amends section 3894 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "illegal" in the first line of that section.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move an amendment in the first section of the bill. In line 7, section 1, I move to strike out "picture-paper," which is a compound word, and insert the words "picture, paper, writing;" so as to read:

Every obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the Senator sure there will be no trouble about it? Is it "paper-writing," or "paper, writing," each as a separate word?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have marked my amendment with a comma between each word, so that the printer cannot mistake it, nor the engrossing clerk either.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I feel that this bill is going to do injustice in certains quarters of this country, though I have not seen it till a moment ago. I propose to strike out the second section. I have not seen it more than five minutes, and therefore am not prepared to state to the Senate as fully as I should like to do the reason why that section ought to be stricken out.

There is no objection to the first section so far as I know. The second section is objectionable for the reason which I shall state. Section 3894 of the Revised Statutes provides—shall pass through the mails.

No letter or circular concerning illegal lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other similar enterprises, &c.,

The second section goes a step further, and strikes out the word "illegal," so that in Louisiana, in Missouri, in Kentucky, where lotteries are legalized, no circular can be mailed at Louisville for Frankfort, for instance. Certainly the Senate does not mean to decide that the citizens of a State where lotteries are legal have no right to send a lottery scheme or circular from one portion of the State to another. That seems to me to be interfering with the rights of the people of the States where they choose to think that the sale of lottery tickets is not criminal or improper. In many States a great change has come over the minds of citizens of the States. In my own State for many years lotteries were authorized. We have built monuments, we have raised moneys for various public institutions—and so in Kentucky, in other States—by means of lotteries; but lotteries are not now tolerated in my State nor are lottery tickets permitted to be sold in the State. Therefore, as far as Maryland is concerned, this would have no application whatever; but in States like Louisiana, Kentucky, Alabama, or Georgia, and Virginia, where I think they are permitted to draw lotteries of some character, it would be highly improper, in my judgment, to allow the postmasters to prevent the circulation of lottery circulars while those States allow lotteries. The provision of the law as it now stands operates upon "illegal lotteries" only, upon lotteries that are unauthorized by law, and I submit to the Senate that the law should stand as it now stands, so far as this second section is concerned. The question, if I remember correctly, came up in 1860, and if I had time I probably could find the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. A very few words in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Maryland.

The Senator has stated precisely what the second section means. All lotteries are regarded, when legalized, as legalized gambling; and in that view the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, with the concurrence of the Department, deem it wise and just and for the best interests of the country to strike out the word "illegal" and to prohibit the transmission through the mails of any matter relating to lotteries. That is precisely what we mean. The difficulty which the Department labors under is in determining what are and what are not legal lotteries. A great many schemes are gotten up, some in the Territories, some of them in operation to-day apparently with the forms of law, but yet of doubtful legal force, and they are transmitting their matter through the mails, and the whole thing proves to be a fraud upon the community; and the question arises whether it is not wiser and better to treat all lotteries, whether legal or illegal, as precisely the same, or as a system of gambling which a wise course in legislation will not only justify but demand at our hands shall be stopped. That is the whole question, and I have no more to say about it.

Mr. WEST. I believe that a Senator might oppose the proposition now reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads without being classed as in favor of the pernicious system of lotteries that prevails through various States. The simple proposition that we have here for action by the Senate is that if any State chooses to legalize a lottery the United States will not lend the machinery of the post-office to carry on such a business. If we once adopt that policy and embark upon it, there is no end whatever to the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States over the morals of the people in their State enactments. We have such a law in our State. I must confess that I always was, and still am, opposed to it. I contend, however, that it is not in the power of the Congress of the United States to resist carrying through the mails of any such papers. Where public morals are concerned, according to the first clause of this bill, it is a very different question, because no State legislates for the transmission of obscene publications or immoral publications; but if a State chooses to authorize and legalize a lottery, call it gambling, if you please, and gambling it is, that is a matter entirely for the consideration of that State, and it does not offend public morals to that extent that those things do to which the other provisions of the bill apply. I say, for one, that Congress has no right to prevent the carriage through the mail of such matters as are legalized by the States themselves; and on this proposition I shall ask for the yeas and nays. The Senator from Maryland has moved to strike out the second section. I want the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I disagree with the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Louisiana as to the power of Congress in reference to providing what shall pass through the mails. If Congress has a right to prohibit obscence matter passing through the mails, it has the right to prohibit lottery tickets or advertisements for lotteries, or any other thing, on the same principle. Now, sir, I am in favor of the proposition as suggested by the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Lotteries, call them by what name you please, when legalized are legalized gambling, and they can only be legalized in States that are in favor of gambling; and wherever a community is so demoralized that they are in favor of gambling they will then legalize lotteries, and not till they are so. I think it not only the right and province but the duty of Congress to prohibit the passing through the mails of anything that advertises a lottery or that pertains to lottery tickets. Of all the swindles that are known in this country, this lottery business is the greatest. The New York lotteries that have been in vogue, and some of which were legalized and some not, were the greatest frauds in this country, and the Baltimore lotteries that the Senator from Maryland spoke of are equally such. So of the Louisville lotteries that I know something about——

Mr. WHYTE. Allow me to correct the Senator. We have had no Baltimore lotteries since 1859. I happened to be on the very committee which framed the provision that prohibited by the constitution our ever having a lottery in Maryland again. We have none there.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand me. I did not say you had any now. I said "the Baltimore lotteries," speaking of them when they existed, were as great frauds as were ever known in this country.

Mr. WHYTE. That is not so.

Mr. LOGAN. So are the Louisville lotteries that are in existence to-day, and the Louisiana lotteries that are in existence to-day. Many people in my part of the country have been made the victims of these gambling frauds. They are nothing more than gambling hells. I would just as lief legalize and license to-day a house in Washington for dealing faro as to legalize a lottery. They are on the same principle, except that I think to deal in faro is a little fairer, because a man can stand by and see when they steal from him and in the lottery case he cannot. That is the only difference. I hope the Senate will maintain the proposition in this bill that the Senator from Maryland moves to strike out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In addition to what the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Illinois have said upon this subject, it is obvious that if thirty-six States were to make the most penal statutes against lotteries, and the mails were open to one that allowed lotteries, the laws of the thirty-six States would be rendered nugatory, because all the people of the thirty-six States could obtain their tickets from this one State as well as though they were authorized from the whole. Therefore if the matter is allowed to run through the mails, any laws by any State against lottery tickets are entirely valueless.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I am a member of the Post-Office Committee. I regard this lottery system as one of the greatest curses that ever was inflicted upon the American people. It fosters and encourages gambling and vice; it is ruining many of the poorer portion of the community. In the State in which I live we have a constitutional provision which prohibits lotteries, and yet there are gift enterprises of one kind or another scattered all over that State endeavoring to evade the law and obtain by false and fraudulent means the money of the people.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." That is not for the benefit of one State, but for the benefit of the whole people as one great Federal Union. For the benefit of the whole people these post offices and post-roads are established. Upon logic, if the Congress of the United States has the power to prevent the passage of obscene books, pamphlets, and pictures through the mails, in like manner it has the power to prevent any other thing which is immoral in its tendency. If it be true that you can permit a lottery ticket to pass from one post-office in a State to another post-office in the same State, the inevitable logic of that would permit an obscene book, pamphlet, or print to pass from the post-office of one State to another post-office in the same State. Hence the whole of it turns on the same general theory, that you cannot use this common carrier established by the Constitution for the benefit of the whole people for any grossly immoral purpose. We had that question before the committee, as the President of the Senate very well knows, in regard to that very matter.

It may be that I go too far on this subject of lotteries; but I regard them as a perfect curse, and I believe in bringing the strong hand of the law down and stopping them, and I do not believe it is in violation of any constitutional right; because I believe the power which is conferred upon Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads" was designed to make them for the benefit of the whole people of the country.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in prohibiting the transmission of any matter through the mails there ought to be great care used and it ought to be particularly described and defined. All of that which is described in the beginning of the first section of this bill is eminently proper to prohibit from being transmitted through the mails; but there is a part of that section that I think is vague and susceptible of abuse. It prohibits the transmission through the mail of "every article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use." What is an "immoral use?" That question may be subject to very different opinions. The word "obscene" is well defined; we can understand what that means; but when you prohibit everything that is for an immoral use, there would be wide differences of opinion on that point.

Mr. CONKLING. The same words are in the law now.

Mr. MORTON. That may be. I remember a time when certain newspapers and pamphlets were prohibited from going through the mails in certain States, because they were held to be of an immoral and seditious character—of "an incendiary character," as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests. Public opinion has changed upon that point. But when we come to prohibit the transmission of any matter through the mails, we ought to understand pretty well what it is. There are many things that a portion of our people would consider immoral that other portions would consider entirely moral. Some people might consider a pack of cards highly immoral; others might think they were entirely proper. Many other things might be enumerated.

Mr. WHYTE. I am delighted that our friends on the other side, the Senator from Illinois and other gentlemen, have suddenly become moralized, if I may be permitted to use that expression. They were not so very moral when they could make money out of lotteries during the war. The Internal Revenue Department taxed lottery tickets.

Mr. LOGAN. What does the Senator mean when he says, speaking of certain Senators, that they were not so very moral during the war? Does he refer to us as having anything to do with lotteries?

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator must not misunderstand me. I say that to-day it is immoral to allow lottery tickets to go through the mail, while during the war or toward the close of the war it was perfectly moral to tax lottery tickets and to make money out of the sale of lottery tickets! That is all I mean to say.

Mr. LOGAN. That depends on the men who were in Congress at that time; a different class perhaps.

Mr. WHYTE. No man has ever set his face against the sale of lottery tickets more thoroughly than I have. I was on the very first committee in the Legislature of my State that broke it up. It was a system that had existed for years and years in the State of Maryland; it was supported by some of the very best men in the State of Maryland. The trustees and managers of it were among the very best citizens of Maryland, and they at that time saw no impropriety in the sale of lottery tickets. It was a game of chance conducted upon scientific principles; and when the Senator from Illinois charges that the lotteries as conducted in Baltimore were frauds, he does not know what he is talking about—that is all I have to say on that question—because they were conducted by managers appointed by the State of the highest character, who controlled the drawings that were made upon a combination that was perfectly scientific and where there was no cheating whatever. But the game was a game of actual, pure chance, just as at your fairs you put your hand in a "grab-bag" and pay for taking out all that your hand can include within it. It is a system which ought not to be encouraged, because on the top of it has been ingrafted another miserable, vicious system known as the policy system, whereby negroes and poor people all over this land have been swindled by policy dealers, whose swindling transactions are based upon the drawings of the lottery.

I am not defending lotteries here; nothing was further from my thought when I rose in this Chamber on this bill. I rose in behalf of the people of States that choose to legalize lotteries; a people who choose to believe that it is not immoral; that it is not degrading; that it is not injurious to public morals to allow lotteries to exist. I rose in behalf of the people of a State that entertained such ideas as those to speak for them and say that Congress ought not to interfere to prevent the parties authorized within the confines of a State sending lottery circulars legally within the State to other post-offices throughout that State. That is all I rose for, in the interest of people within the States and only in their interest. Personally I have none; my people have no interest in this matter. It is a violation of the law of my State to sell a lottery ticket, or to sell a ticket based upon a lottery, known as "policy." It is against our law; men are punished with the severest penalties, a thousand dollars' fine and imprisonment in the jail, for selling a lottery ticket or a policy ticket within my State.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him so far as to correct his statement that the Government of the United States at any time have done anything in order to encourage lotteries. The very law to which he refers was an obstruction to lotteries, taxing them very severely if they existed in any State, and especially providing that nothing in the law contained should be construed to legalize any lottery, whereas the Senator's proposition is to furnish facilities for lotteries.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly, Mr. President, I did claim that Congress legalized lotteries, but you made money out of them wherever they were legalized. You took good care to tax them, and to put the money in the Treasury wherever you could lay your hands upon them; and it will not do to-day, when there is no money to be made out of them, to rise and denounce them, as if they were something just found out to be hurtful to the community.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Precisely as we make money out of the liquor traffic and as we make money out of those who commit any criminal offense: we subject them to a fine.

Mr. WHYTE. There is no provision in this law to keep a bottle of whisky from passing through the mails. You do not stop that.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, that is embraced. That is "adapted to an immoral purpose."

Mr. WHYTE. It might be for medicinal purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. It might be, but it is "adapted to an immoral purpose."

Mr. WHYTE. So is almost everything in this world liable to abuse.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can send the whisky in a tin can.

Mr. WHYTE. It drinks just as well out of a tin can, I suppose, as out of a glass bottle.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be liable to break in the mail in a glass bottle, and therefore would not be sent in that way.

Mr. WHYTE. But, Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate. The bill was hastily brought into the Senate, hastily reported this morning, and action asked on it.

Mr. HAMLIN. It was reported long ago, and passed the House longer ago.

Mr. WHYTE. The bill does not appear to have been reported until this morning, as I find it on my table. However, I have called the attention of the Senate to it; that is all I meant to do. I wanted the Senate to know and appreciate that, in the passage of this bill as it is, they were, in States where lotteries are permitted, preventing the circulation of lottery circulars within the confines of those States.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to say in reply to the Senator from Maryland and his reference to me about my becoming so moralized, as he calls it, that I am a little surprised at his position. He admits that lotteries are immoral in their tendency and in fact, and that while they existed in Baltimore they were so demoralizing that his State had to pass a statute prohibiting them, and attach a penalty to it, I believe, of $1,000 fine and imprisonment. He admits that his State and that he, taking part in the organization of the fundamental law of the State, advocated that proposition. Therefore, he admits by his argument that they are immoral and wrong, and ought to be prohibited; but, inasmuch as they are not prohibited in some places, therefore he desires that those places shall have an opportunity of exercising this immoral course of conduct. That is the argument of the Senator from Maryland; immoral in Maryland, but perfectly moral in Louisiana; immoral in Maryland, but moral in Kentucky; immoral in Maryland, but moral everywhere else where they exist in accordance with law! Now, I should like to ask the Senator—of course it is a proposition that is outside of our present ideas—suppose some State should legalize horse-stealing, would he advocate the sending of circulars through the mails for the purpose of encouraging men to commit horse-theft in the country? That is his argument. Although wrong in his State, if it is legalized in another State, therefore it must be lawful in all the States. That is the argument of the Senator from Maryland.

Now, my theory is that if it is immoral in Maryland it is immoral anywhere else; if it is wrong in one place it is wrong in another place. If it strikes the sense of the proper community as wrong, it is wrong; and, as I said before, I would just as lief authorize circulars to be sent out from a gambling-house in Washington City encouraging people to invest their money in what is called banking in gambling parlance, a faro-bank or roulette, or anything of that kind, as to authorize the sending of circulars encouraging persons to put their money in a lottery.

Now, let us see whether it is dishonest or not. He says some of the nicest people in Maryland, some of the most enlightened people in Maryland, some people of the highest character in Maryland, were trustees for the lottery. I do not know what you call them, lottery offices or whatever that may be—lottery schemes. Some of the honest people of Maryland—doubtless he thinks they were honest—were so engaged, he says. I should want to have a great deal of evidence to satisfy me that any man who went into a lottery scheme was an honest man. I may be wrong about it; but when a man tells me that he sells me a ticket for $10 and that that ticket only has one chance in a thousand to draw a cent, and calls that an honest performance, I do not believe it. And I do not believe any honest man will engage in a lottery business. Men may be wealthy and considered as standing very well in society because of their wealth or their position; but, if they have made their wealth by lottery schemes, they are no better than gamblers, no better than the keepers of gambling-houses, and ought to stand no better in the community. When a man tells me that a person engaged in the lottery business is a gentleman, I say to him he is such a gentleman as a gambler is anywhere, and no more. If a man has made a fortune by gambling, his fortune may give him a certain position in society, people may tolerate him because he has a fortune, but it is his money, not the man, that secures recognition. It is on the principle that if a man owns a jackass he may vote, and if the jackass dies, he shall not; so that the jackass is respected and the man is not. That is all there is of it. And that is the principle on which men who engage in lotteries are considered gentlemen in this country. They are gamblers, extortioners, and men who act in a fraudulent way for the purpose of depriving their fellow-citizens of their money. They ought not to be recognized either by law or by the courtesy of society, nor do I think the gentlemen who defend them have a very nice notion of morality either.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to strike out section 2. On this question the Senator from Louisiana has asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARVEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask leave to present a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

LOT M. MORRILL,
W. B. ALLISON,
T. M. NORWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAML. J. RANDALL,
WM. M. SPRINGER,
JOHN A. KASSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments and ask for a further conference.

I deem it proper that the Senate should be put in possession of the points of disagreement between the two Houses as exhibited in the propositions of the two committees. It will be remembered that on the occasion of making the former report I stated the differences between the two branches as exhibited by the propositions of the two committees; and it will be remembered that the main point of the difference then was on certain amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to various laws touching salaries and to certain other statutes effecting a change of the public service. Substantially the position on the part of the Senate was a resistance to the amendment of any law touching the public service which in the judgment of the Senate was not compatible with the interests of the public service; and on every other question of appropriation, where it was not a matter of law but a matter of discretion, the Senate proposed to concur with the House upon such terms and upon such concessions as should be agreed on by both parties. That was the standing of the question on the first conference.

Now, one of the principal difficulties was the proposed change of the law affecting salaries generally, and as that was a matter which the conferees on the part of the Senate did not believe, if it was just and proper in any sense, was at all consistent with an appropriation bill, they held, in harmony with what they believed to be the sentiment of the Senate, that that was not a fit and proper thing to attempt to do on an appropriation bill, that it was impracticable and inexpedient, and that it ought not to be attempted on the part of the Senate and ought not to be forced on the Senate by the House. That was really the main point of disagreement.

Now, there has been some attempt on the part of the conferees to avoid that difficulty, to come to some conclusion by which salaries, either in full or in part, may be appropriated for as the House see fit to make them, as it is difficult for us to say how much they shall appropriate. There has been an attempt on the part of the conferees, I repeat, to avoid the real point of difficulty, which is the attempt to change laws establishing salaries or the public service in any other sense, without the consent of the Senate.

The House of Representatives, having asked this conference, of course were bound to make a proposition, and I will read the proposition for the information of the Senate, to enable us to understand precisely the point of difference between the two branches as represented in the propositions submitted by the committees. The first proposition of the House conferees was:

SEC. 2. That the sums herein appropriated—

Referring to the bill, of course.

That the sums herein appropriated as the compensation of the officers and employés of the Government respectively enumerated in this act shall be in full for all compensation to such officers or employés for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, unless Congress shall otherwise provide in the manner hereinafter authorized.

Then follows an additional section:

SEC. 3. That a joint select committee of four shall be appointed, two by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the requisite number and proper salaries of the officers, clerks, and employés in the several Executive Departments of the Government, with a view to the due and permanent adjustment of the same, having regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service. Said joint committee shall sit during the recess of Congress, and shall make their report thereon to the two Houses on the 1st Monday of December next.

That was the proposition on the part of the House conferees, to which the Senate committee replied with a proposition striking out the second section, which fixes the permanent salaries, and inserting in lieu of it:

That a special committee of four, two of whom shall be appointed by the presiding officer of each House, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the subject-matter of the salaries of the clerks and officers in the Executive Departments with the view to a revision and adjustment of the same, having due regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service, and make report of their doings therein on the 1st day of the next session of Congress: And provided, That any change in said salaries made thereupon by Congress shall take effect from the 1st day of July, 1876, and all persons who shall be affected thereby and who shall continue in the service shall be deemed to have accepted the terms hereof and acquiesced therein.

Keeping in mind the point of difference between the two Houses, which was the resistance on the part of the Senate to any attempt on the part of the House to change a law fixing salaries or changing the public service in any essential particular to which the Senate could not agree, our conferees sought to avoid it. The House proposition, it will be perceived, is that the salaries provided for in the bill, enumerated in the bill, shall be fixed as thus provided for for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That proposition is to decide the case first and try it afterward?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely. It will be seen that does not avoid the point of difficulty; it is still fixing the salaries. Now, to avoid that necessity and to meet the House of Representatives on the substantive proposition, which is the amount to be appropriated—for that is the point—the Senate conferees say, "We will agree to these salaries as you have appropriated;" that is to say, "We agree to take this appropriation for what it is," and "instead of saying these shall be the fixed and settled salaries for the fiscal year, we will provide for a special or select committee to consider that question and report to Congress on the 1st day of December next; and the salaries which shall be fixed by Congress upon that report shall be the salaries for this year." We think that cures this difficulty, for this reason: It relieves the Senate and ought to relieve the House, because it contemplates an appropriation in harmony with what they propose, to be corrected, however, upon a revision of the whole question of salaries made by a committee indifferently selected of both branches, whose report, when submitted to Congress and acted upon, shall furnish a rule for the salaries for this fiscal year and for the future.

That, I believe, is the exact position of the case as presented in the propositions of the two committees. Whether the Senate will come to the conclusion that we have really made any advance or not, I do not know; but having been unable to agree, the Senate committee have thought it best, and finally feel it their duty, to try again, with some expectation, or some hope at least, that we may finally agree upon some proposition which shall relieve the embarrassment of both branches.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments to this bill, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The President pro tempore was, by unanimous consent, authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 961) for the relief of J. A. Stevenson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale;

A bill (H. R. No. 3495) for the relief of the mail contractors on route No. 19319 in Tennessee; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 129) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the bill just announced from the House of Representatives be taken up.

The bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read twice. It provides that for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations for such Departments shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, it shall be lawful for any of the Departments of the Government for which appropriations for that fiscal year are delayed to use for the necessary service of such Department any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would say to the Senator that in many large Departments of the Government there are probably no unexpended balances.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly. That will not cover it. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the bill is referred, I wish to say that I am a little surprised at the reception of this bill. I believe it was only yesterday that the Senate passed a joint resolution, which is the same thing in point of law as a bill, on this same subject, and I assume that it was sent to the House of Representatives. Now, instead of our resolution coming back with any amendment, we have a fresh bill upon the same subject. Acting upon the same theory, I should suppose that this bill ought to be referred, and we ought to pass a fresh bill of our own, without any regard to this, and send it over to the House, and so keep on in that way. That would seem to be what is to be drawn from this method of doing business. I of course do not object to the reference of the bill. I only call attention to this rather extraordinary mode of proceeding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the language of this bill in one respect. I am very doubtful if it covers the appropriation for public p.inting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is entirely inadequate in its general bearing. It applies only to unexpended balances. There are some branches where there is no unexpended balance. At any rate, it is a matter to be considered to what extent it is adequate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would also suggest another difficulty. How will it be possible for a disbursing officer to know whether or not there is in the Treasury Department to the credit of a particular fund a particular balance? He cannot have access to the Treasury Department unless he happens to be here in Washington. Perhaps a disbursing officer here might go and ascertain whether there was a balance in the Treasury to the credit of a particular fund; but a disbursing officer at Saint Louis or elsewhere over the country, making payments to the Army like a paymaster, could not tell whether or not a particular appropriation was exhausted. It is clear, therefore, that for any contingency, for any expenditure, that occurs after to-day, there must be a fresh appropriation of money in the Treasury of the United States, because the money that was to the credit of all these funds is by law covered into the Treasury, and it would be very difficult for any one, even the Treasurer, to tell where there is at this moment unpaid and unexpended a balance of any particular appropriation. That depends on the state of the accounts. I merely call the attention of my friend from Maine to the difficulty that even if we should pass this bill there would be difficulty in making it a practical measure of relief under the peculiar circumstances by which we are surrounded.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RECESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if there are any further reports of committees of conference ready now?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The matter of important concern at the present moment is to consider the bill just referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Maine, as this matter is of so much importance, and as the bill from the House seems to be in the opinion of the financial Senators quite inadequate to the purpose intended, and inasmuch as a large number of the Senators are engaged upon committees of conference, leaving us constantly without a quorum, and constantly compelling those Senators to leave their work unfinished to come here and vote upon questions that they have not heard discussed and hardly know what they are and then going back to take up the broken thread of their conferences, whether it would not be an economy of time for us to take a short recess in order to give the committees of conference free use of their time and to allow the Committee on Appropriations to consider this very important matter, and then the Senators, I trust, will all be able to come here and attend to the only business of to-day, which is the appropriation bills. We shall undoubtedly have to sit to-night.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think if quite a number of Senators could be relieved from attendance on the Senate for a time it would really facilitate the public business. The Committee on Appropriations ought to lose no time in acting on the measure just referred to them.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it will meet the assent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I will move that the Senate take a recess until four o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate now take a recess until four o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until four o'clock p. m.

The Senate re-assembled at four o'clock p. m.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow me to make a motion to reconsider a vote taken by the Senate this morning—and, very much to my surprise, I did not learn anything about it until some time after it took place—to refer the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, to the Committee on Finance. By the practice of the Senate ordinarily the bill ought to have gone on the Calendar; but a motion was made, not understood in the Chamber, to refer it to the Committee on Finance. The friends of the measure are very anxious that that vote shall be reconsidered. I wish to submit that motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the motion being made after the sundry civil bill is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota desires his bill taken up and will then yield to the Senator from California. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATY WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. We ought to understand that matter. I should like an opportunity to vote upon the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This change of reference was considered, and I supposed that every Senator understood it; every one who was present, certainly. I desire to say again, as I have already said, that the bill being for a change of the tariff law to conform to the Hawaiian treaty, ought to have been referred in the first instance to the Committee on Finance. It is merely to provide a change of the tariff laws in relation to this subject, and I am very sure that such a matter as that would be better considered by the Committee on Finance than by any other committee of this body. It is a subject with which they are familiar. I have never read the bill and do not know anything about what is in it; but I am quite sure that the judgment of the Senate will be that it should have been referred to that committee in the first instance; and not having been so referred, I do not think it will produce any delay to have it referred to that committee now. There will be ample time to consider it and report upon it before there will be an opportunity for the Senate to act upon it; and certainly it is a bill that ought to be very carefully considered both as to its substance and phraseology.

Mr. WINDOM. Would it not answer the purpose of the Senator from California to merely enter the motion to reconsider at this time?

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose I shall have to take that course, owing to the exigency of the business of the country; but I should like to say that I have never known a matter of this kind put through in so quiet and silent a way as that was this morning. I sat in my seat and knew nothing about it at all. Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations who authorized it to be reported knew nothing about it. So far as the change of the tariff law is concerned, that was done by the treaty itself, and this bill which has passed the House is simply to carry that treaty into effect. There is nothing to be scanned in the legislation, so far as the tariff is concerned, and there was not the slightest propriety in referring it to the Committee on Finance unless the purpose was to unreasonably delay the bill. It is a very unusual thing when a bill is reported by a committee, who have taken weeks to examine it, to whom it has been referred by the Senate, to then send it to another committee. It certainly is not done sub silentio and without an ample opportunity to allow the Senate to have an opinion upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will suggest to the Senator from California that the bill came from the corresponding committee in the House of Representatives, the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; and that was the proper reference of the bill here. It relates to our foreign relations, and the disposition of the Senate to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations was in accordance with the precedents of the Senate; and it seems to me an advantage was taken of a very thin Senate and a very early hour this morning in order to make a different disposition of it. I wish to have the motion entered and will call it up at an early moment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to discuss this subject, but simply desire to say to my friend from California that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania] reported the bill and opposed the motion to refer it to the Committee on Finance, and one or two short speeches were made on the subject, so that it was not passed without there being a full opportunity for anybody to have known that this action occurred. I, myself, was opposed to the new reference. I thought it was sufficient that the bill had been considered by one committee.

Mr. SARGENT. It was too important a matter to be put through in the first few moments of the day's session, when it is well known that many Senators are not here, but are busy in their committee-rooms. I certainly should have opposed the motion most strenuously, and would not have been content with a decision of the matter in any other way than by a call of the yeas and nays. It is very well known that some Senators have been very busy in conference committees and that the members of the Committee on Appropriations have been generally absorbed in the general business of the country. I felt very much injured when I found that at so early an hour, without general notice of what was going on, this very important measure was pushed on without any apparent advantage to anybody, except to further delay the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let me say that I made at least two short speeches on the subject and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] opposed the motion; so that it did not pass without the attention of the Senate being drawn to it; and if the motion was to be made at all it must have been made when the Senator having the bill in charge reported it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope, under all the circumstances, that the Senator from Vermont will allow the vote to be reconsidered in order that the question upon the motion to refer may be understood. I will state that I did this morning oppose the motion made by the Senator from Vermont. The motion was made immediately upon the report having been made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and before the Senate was by any means full. I protested against the motion. I should have called for the yeas and nays at the time had it not been for the fact that I glanced over the Senate and found that the friends of the measure generally were not here, and I was satisfied that a vote at that time, with the Senate constituted as it was, would result in committing the bill to the Committee on Finance. In a few moments afterward I found that several members of the Committee on Foreign Relations even, who had voted favorably to the bill, were in the Chamber but knew nothing about the reference to the Finance Committee; they had no knowledge whatever of the change of reference. My friend from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who as we all know has been a champion of this treaty, was not aware of the fact that the bill had been committed to the Committee on Finance until some time after the motion had been made and the vote taken. I hope, under these circumstances, that the vote may be reconsidered.

Mr. SARGENT. I submit the motion and will call it up at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORDON. As I understood the Senator from California, he simply wished to have the motion entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is entered, and its present consideration is not persisted in.

ARMSTEAD GOODLOW.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appeal to the kindly disposition of my friend from Minnesota. The Senator from Kansas yesterday as chairman of the Committee on Pensions had, as he supposed, all the cases on the Calendar from his committee granting pensions disposed of. There was one case overlooked, however, by inadvertence. I ask the indulgence of my friend to allow that case to be taken up. It will take but a moment.

Mr. WINDOM. I will not object to that case.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 535.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Armstead Goodlow, late private in Company E, Twenty-third Regiment of United States Colored Troops.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I appeal to the Senator from Minnesota to allow me to make a report.

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add to the bill:

And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation, the necessary amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and no greater amount shall be expended by any Department under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditure shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums expended under this act shall be charged to, and be deducted from, the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that in addition to the House bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It does not change the House bill; it is simply an addition to it. The House bill provided simply for the expenditure of an unexpended balance. This merely extends the appropriation bills for the present fiscal year over a period of ten days in the next fiscal year, and provides for a deduction from the appropriation bills for the next year of the amount expended under this bill.

Mr. EATON. In other words, if there be no unexpended balance there is an appropriation for ten days relatively?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; a relative appropriation for ten days, to be deducted from the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask a question of the Senator who reports this bill. I see the word "Department" is used. I ask does that mean the Executive Departments of the Government, or is it used in the generic sense of the word?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not limited to the Executive. I think it is broad enough to cover the entire service.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to know whether it covers the public printing, which is not a Department, nor in any Department, though it has some relation to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hardly think it would, because that is a special service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then you think this does not cover it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I doubt if it would.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator make an amendment that will include it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is that necessary?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly it is necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there not a balance to the credit of that service?

Mr. ANTHONY. But, as I understand, there is no right to use the balance. I think there is a balance to the credit of the Congressional Printer which would enable him to go on for ten days, but I do not understand that the bill as it came from the House, or as it is proposed to be amended, will cover that particular expenditure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I doubt if it does. It should be amended to include that.

Mr. CONKLING. The language is, "to the credit of any appropriation," not "the credit of any Department." What is the reason that does not cover the case mentioned by the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Because I think it is limited to Departments before.

Mr. CONKLING. The language to which I call the Senator's attention is in the very beginning. It cannot be limited before:

And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation—

Not "Department,"

the necessary amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and no greater amount shall be expended by any Department under this act.

That is where "Department" comes in. Going only so far, I inquire if the phrase there, "any appropriation," does not cover this?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That would be broad enough if there was no limitation; but now go on.

Mr. CONKLING—

And no greater amount shall be expended by any Department under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditures shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. INGALLS. If you leave out the words "by any Department," it will cover the whole thing.

Mr. CONKLING. Even with those words, it would not have occurred to me, if I understood the question of the Senator from Rhode Island, that this language was not broad enough to cover that case.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will leave that to the lawyers. I only wanted to cover the case.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he and his committee might prefer, in view of the suggestion, to omit these three words, "by any Department," so that the phraseology would be:

And no greater amount shall be expended under this act.

Omitting the words, "by any Department."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will remind the Senator from New York that that is in addition to the body of the bill as it comes from the House, and in order to see the exact construction both need to be read; and that is the reason why I think there may be a limitation.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the bill be read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations for such Departments shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1877, it shall be lawful for any of the Departments of the Government for which appropriations for the said fiscal year are delayed to use for the necessary service of such Departments any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. CONKLING. Now read the addition proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation, the necessary amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and no greater amount shall be expended by any Department under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditure shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. SARGENT. The amendment offered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is in the nature of a limitation, and any words of amendment in order to cover the case suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island would have to be to the original proposition, which are the words of grant. Now, I suggest an amendment which will cover the case, in my judgment; I shall have to state it from my seat, and then will pass it to the Clerk, because there is not a printed copy of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a printed copy on the Senator's table, just laid there.

Mr. SARGENT. I want to strike out the words "for any of the Departments of the Government for which appropriations for the said fiscal year are delayed," in line 8.

Mr. WEST. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from California that he add to the conclusion of the bill:

And the provisions of this act shall apply to the public printing of the Government.

Mr. SARGENT. That would do very well except that we authorize the Departments to use the money, and if it is not in charge of a Department the bill will not reach the difficulty. I propose to strike out all after the word "lawful," in line 8, down to the word "use," on line 10, and in line 10 to strike out the words "such Departments," and insert "the Government," so as to read:

That for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1877, unless the regular appropriations for such Departments shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1877, it shall be lawful to use for the necessary service of the Government any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. ANTHONY. Should not the words "such Departments" be left out of line 5?

Mr. WEST. Let them be changed to "such purposes."

Mr. ANTHONY. Where the word "Departments" occurs for the first time in line 5 it should be changed.

Mr. SARGENT. I will move to strike out the words "for such Departments," in line 5; so as to read:

Unless the regular appropriations shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That covers it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now let it be read as it will stand thus amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended the bill will read:

That for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations——

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to make one suggestion. It seems to me that if you will add in line 9, after the word "Government," the words "and the public printing," you will cover the whole case.

Mr. SARGENT. What will you do with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing? It would have no provision for watchmen.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not that in the Treasury Department?

Mr. SARGENT. But it is temporary in the Treasury Department, and would fail without appropriations. I have a letter from the Treasury stating that fact. I could suggest other services which are in the same condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The judicial service itself may not fall technically under the head of a departmental expenditure. It is better, as the Senator from California suggests, to strike out the word "Departments" altogether and make it "the appropriations for the service of the Government." That enables all branches of the Government to go on for the ten days.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the proposition be reported now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill as it is proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended the bill will read:

That for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1877, it shall be lawful to use for the necessary service of the Government any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me suggest to the Senator from California that there are some appropriation bills through for some of the Departments; and if he amends this bill as he proposes now, will it not occur that they would carry on such Departments for which we have already made appropriations, upon the basis of last year?

Mr. SARGENT No, sir; because the amendment of the committee covers that point.

Mr. WRIGHT. I know; but for the ten days?

Mr. ANTHONY. It says "unless the regular appropriations shall have been previously made."

Mr. SARGENT. And we provide that the amount thus expended shall be deducted from the regular appropriations.

Mr. WRIGHT. It says "unless regular appropriations shall have been previously made." Will not that apply to all appropriations? And if you have an appropriation for one Department that reduces the expenses for next year, will it not be true that under the language as you now leave it it may expend money on the basis of the appropriations of last year?

Mr. SARGENT. They can expend for ten days on the ratio that ten days bear to three hundred and sixty-five, and whatever amount is so expended is deducted from the regular appropriation bills when passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me explain the suggestion I make. We passed the bill, for instance, for the Navy Department. Now suppose it to be true that, on the basis of that bill as passed yesterday by the two Houses for the next year, the expenditure is to be 10 per cent. less than it was last year. Now, if you pass this bill as is now proposed, you do not apply it to each Department for itself, but you apply it to all the appropriations for the Government.

Mr. WEST. "Unless the regular appropriation shall have been previously made."

Mr. WRIGHT. But as it stood before, it was "unless the regular appropriations for such Departments shall have been made." But you strike out "for such Departments" and then you leave it "unless the regular appropriations shall have been previously made;" not for the Department, but in the aggregate.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not see any force in the Senator's criticism, I must confess. I think the Senator will be satisfied if he will hear the amendment of the committee read.

Mr. WEST. How will it do to strike out the article "the" in line 5 and make it "unless regular appropriations" instead of "the regular appropriations."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations by way of addition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation, the necessary amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no greater amount shall be expended by any Department under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditure shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the words "by any Department;" so as to read:

No greater amount shall be expended under this act.

That is in harmony with the suggestion made by the Senator from California. Then, wherever an appropriation bill shall not have passed, the service of that branch of the Government during these ten days will be charged to the appropriation for that branch, whether you call it a Department or not, and taken out of it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to the bill which has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reread.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill so as to read:

That for a period not exceeding ten days, from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1877, it shall be lawful to use for the necessary services of the Government any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876. And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation, the necessary amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and no greater amount shall be expended under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditure shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums expended under this act shall be charged to and be deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT AT ROCKLAND, MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want the Senator from Minnesota to allow me to offer a bill to correct an error. I do not think it will take five minutes, probably not half that.

Mr. WINDOM. If it gives rise to no discussion I will yield for that purpose, but give notice that I cannot yield for any other business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present a bill which I ask may be considered.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 962) to amend an act approved April 17, 1876, providing for the sale of a part of custom lot in Rockland, Maine.

The bill proposes to amend the act approved April 17, 1876, so that the strip of land therein described shall be as follows:

Beginning at the northerly corner of land of the heirs of Charles Spofford, and running thence north eight degrees, east one hundred and twenty-one and four-tenths feet to Lime Rock street, at the northwesterly corner of land of Oliver H. Perry, formerly ship-builder's lot; thence south thirty minutes east by the land of said Perry and John T. Berry one hundred and twenty-four feet to land of said Spofford's heirs; thence north seventy-six degrees west by land of said Spofford's heirs eighteen and six-tenths feet to the place of beginning, containing about eleven hundred and twenty feet.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell and convey the described land upon the same terms and conditions named in the act to which this is additional.

Mr. HAMLIN. On the 17th of April we passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell a little strip of land that lies across the street from the custom-house, and that was valueless, so far as the Government was concerned. It was eighteen feet wide at one end, and ran one hundred and twenty feet to a point at the other. I drew the bill myself, but I made a mistake, and said in the bill "eighteen feet at the northerly end." It was right the reverse, and this simply changes it. The strip of land is eighteen feet at the southerly end, running to a point at the north, whereas I drew the bill "eighteen feet at the northerly end, running to a point one hundred and twenty feet south." The surveyor has sent a survey, and I have drawn this bill precisely in accordance with the actual surveys.

By unanimous consent the bill was read three times, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the third committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. WITHERS.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing; and

A bill (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. With the assent of the Senator from Minnesota I ask that the amendment of the House to the bill for continuing the Government Printing Office may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing, returned from the House of Representatives, with an amendment, which was in line 4 to strike out the word "sixty" and insert "ten" in lieu thereof; so as to read:

This act shall continue in force ten days, &c.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. WRIGHT. A Senate bill has come back from the House with two verbal amendments that do not change the sense of the bill at all. I ask the concurrence of the Senate in the amendments of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners, returned from the House with amendments.

The amendments were on page 2, line 8, to strike out the words "such change" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the place of imprisonment;" and on page 2, line 8, to strike out "ordered" and insert "changed."

The amendments were concurred in.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Before proceeding with the consideration of the appropriation bill, I would submit for the judgment of the Senate a motion that we take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven. I submit that motion in order that if the Senate shall decide not to take a recess I may ask them to continue in session somewhat later than the usual hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, until you finish the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. Until we finish the bill, if possible. I will say further that I think the Senate should not adjourn to-day until action is taken on the bill just now sent to the House. I move that a recess be taken from five o'clock until half past seven to-day.

The Chair put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not see any advantage in coming back here. I think we ought to sit here two or three hours. There is no great stress upon us. If we come back at half-past seven perhaps we shall not have a quorum. There is business which ought to be attended to, and we may not be able to attend to it for the want of a quorum.

Several SENATORS. We shall have a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regards the objection of the Senator from New Jersey as in the nature of a call for a division.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to my colleague of the Committee on Appropriations that if the House concurs in the amendments we have made to the bill just voted on we shall have ten days in which to consider this bill and can proceed with it to-morrow probably with more care than we could with a scant quorum, or none at all, at a late hour to-night and not wear ourselves out. If there is doubt about the House accepting those amendments, we ought to rush these things through as early as possible.

Mr. WINDOM. Ought we not to remain in session until that question is decided by the House?

Mr. SARGENT. For that reason I think we had better sit two or three hours longer until we get a message from the House, and not have an evening session.

Mr. WINDOM. If there be no objection I will withdraw the motion for a recess at present and renew it hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not withdraw it, but take the sense of the Senate, so that we shall know whether we are to come this evening or to stay now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the motion had better be insisted on. You will be without a quorum if you withdraw it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would inquire if the motion has not been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so announced; but the Senator from New Jersey rose in the nature of a call for a division, as the Chair recognized it, and therefore the question is open and the Senator from Minnesota has a right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that the Senator from Minnesota postpone this motion until near five o'clock or a little after five o'clock. We can tell then whether we must have a night session to pass this bill or whether we can act on it to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. How can we tell, if the message does not come in by that time, any better than we can now?

Mr. ANTHONY. Probably the message will come in by that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate take a recess to-day from five o'clock until half past seven.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 23 noes 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose by that the Chair means that it will be read through in the regular way, acting on the amendments as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a brief statement with reference to the principal items of the bill.

With the exception of unexpended balances amounting to $640,393.21, the appropriations by the House bill are $15,236,731.32. The net additions made by the Senate committee are $4,684,603.55, the total of the bill as reported to the Senate being $19,941,334.87. The total of the bill for the current year was $29,459,853.02. This bill, as reported by the Senate committee, is less than that of the current year by $9,518,518.15.

The principal items constituting the increase of $4,684,603, made by the Senate committtee, I will state very briefly: First, there is an appropriation for the impeachment trial, $50,000; second, the appropriation for public printing has been increased $612,770.17, the amount being still somewhat below that of last year and not above the amount actually required for the service. Another addition for the general expenses of the District of Columbia, amounting to $500,000. The appropriation last year for that purpose was $1,245,000. For Utah Territory the committee have added $23,000. The House bill appropriated $20,000 for the payment of certain expenditures which had been incurred for the courts, whereas, in fact, the amount actually expended was $43,000. The committee added enough to bring the appropriation to the amount actually expended.

For mints and assay offices the committee have added $70,000, the demand for this growing out of the increased amount of silver to be coined.

For various public buildings all over the United States, the committee have added something over a million of dollars, $1,150,000, believing that the additions in all cases were in the line of economy, for the continuation of the buildings and the more economical conduct of the work.

For the preservation and repair of public buildings under the Treasury Department, the committee have added $150,000.

For navy-yards, which were wholly omitted by the House bill, the committee have added $730,000. We have some fifty million dollars' worth of property in the various navy-yards, and no appropriation whatever is made in the House bill for their preservation or for any necessary improvements. That was an item wholly omitted in the bill.

For the Rock Island arsenal we have added $167,000.

For various miscellaneous items about the Capitol, such as taking up the floors and repairing the gas-pipes, paving the grounds about the Capitol, &c., the committee have added $139,000.

They have increased the amount for furniture in the various buildings under the control of the Treasury Department $25,000.

They have added to the appropriation for the pay of the custodians of public buildings, in order to approximate something to the pay they have hitherto had, $50,000.

For temporary clerks in the Treasury Department they have added $60,000, which is an appropriation that has, I believe, been made for many years.

For the Signal Office we have added $100,000, the amount appropriated by the House bill not being sufficient to carry on the extensive and very valuable work that is being done by that service.

The other large items are: Surveying the public lands, $187,500 additional, the House bill appropriating only $200,000 for all the surveys in all the States and Territories, the appropriation for officers, surveyors-general, land officers, &c., being somewhere over $100,000, and only $200,000 appropriated for carrying on the work. The committee deemed it true economy to appropriate money enough to do some portion of the work as well as to pay the officers. For registers of land offices $166,216 have been added. This is simply in compliance with the law which fixes their compensation.

The committee also recommend the purchase of certain property belonging to the Freedman's Bank, for which the appropriation necessary will be $325,000.

These various items will be explained, as we reach them, if desired; but I have stated those which constitute nearly all the items of the increase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 25, after the word "the," to strike out "executor" and insert "heirs;" and in line 27, after the word "dollars," to strike out "to be held and applied by said executors as if a part of the estate of said Wilson, given and bequeathed by his will;" so as to make the clause read:

To pay to the heirs of the estate of Henry Wilson, late Vice-President of the United States, the sum of $10,222.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 30 to 39 the following items:

To defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment of William W. Belknap, $50,000.

To pay Fillmore Beall for fifteen days' service as clerk to the Senate Committee on Revolutionary Claims, from March 10, 1875, to March 24, inclusive, at $6 per day, $90.

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount due and audited by the Treasury Department to A. N. McKimmon for services as clerk to a court-martial, $9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill down to line 49.

Mr. WINDOM. At this point I move to strike out from lines 46 to 49, in the following words:

To pay George W. Green, contestee in contested-election case of Green vs. Van Wyck, fourteenth district of New York, Forty-first Congress, $3,000.

On my own responsibility, not having had an opportunity to consult the committee about it, I move to strike out that paragraph. I see it is for a claim; I did not observe it at the time the bill was considered in committee. I make the motion at the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I was going to move to strike out lines 46 to 49, and as the Senator from Minnesota has stated the reasons I will not trouble the Senate with repeating them. This is an old acquaintance of mine. Here is an attempt to pay in an appropriation bill the expenses of a contestee in the Forty-first Congress. I would not think of interfering with the present House of Representatives in their paying any one who contests or is contested in a seat in that House. Each House should be entirely free to settle that question for itself, and the House of Representatives in the Forty-first Congress did decide upon all questions and settle all claims which they felt deserving. This was not brought up. But this is a peculiar case. Here was a contestee who held his seat from the 4th of March down to the 17th of the next February, just one-half of a month less than a year, and drew the pay during that time, and then the House of Representatives voted that he was not entitled to the seat at all. He comes three Congresses afterward and gets the House of Representatives to put in an appropriation bill for $3,000 to pay his expenses in that contest.

The House of Representatives during all that time that the members of the House were paid a per diem was in the habit of paying unsuccessful contestants the per diem up to the time the case was decided; but it never paid a contestee in the world during all that time for his expenses. When the compensation became a salary, it paid him a salary for some time. After it became $5,000 the amount became very large, and the House of Representatives then adopted a new rule, that it would pay, not the salary to an unsuccessful contestant up to the time that the case was decided, but it would pay, in all cases that the Committee of Elections certified were prosecuted in good faith, the actual expenses. That was the rule, and that, I believe, is now the rule. But during none of that time did it pay a contestee, because the contestee had the salary. There were one or two instances, sporadic, I think you might call them, governed by no rule, where some gentlemen got their expenses paid. The rule is as I have stated it. If this is paid, there are more than forty just such cases of contestees who would be entitled just like this man to their expenses for maintaining their right to a seat or for attempting to maintain themselves in a seat unsuccessfully, as this man did. I remember a case in the Thirty-fourth Congress where a contestant had a bill introduced for his relief, my friends from Iowa may remember, by the name of Clark. It came up Congress after Congress for a dozen of years, each year being voted out.

This is the first case that has come under my notice of anybody appealing from the action, or the want of action, of the House in which the contest was made to a subsequent Congress, and succeeding. I hope it will not be allowed in this case, because it will set a precedent that will be measured only by the number of living men who have gone through with this proceeding like this man.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts how long the contestee held his seat?

Mr. DAWES. The contestee held his seat, as I have seen by the record, from the 4th of March down to the 17th of February of the next year; that is, about one-half of a month less than a year.

Mr. PADDOCK. Who was the contestant?

Mr. DAWES. The contestant, as is stated here, was General Van Wyck. Van Wyck contested the seat that Green held, and at the end of a year, lacking one-half of a month, Van Wyck was voted into the seat which Green held and Green was voted out with the salary.

Mr. PADDOCK. And now, I wish to inquire, did Van Wyck draw his salary from the commencement of the regular term?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, he did. I do not speak of the merits of the contest; it is not proper that they should be discussed here. I only speak of this being a departure from the settled precedent of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PADDOCK. The point I was trying to get at is whether two claimants for a seat could be paid during this period of time.

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly the man who held the certificate drew his salary up to the time the House voted that he was not entitled to the seat. Then the man who was voted in drew his salary from the beginning, because the House decided that he was entitled to the seat.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am very glad to hear that the contestant was able to obtain his pay from the commencement of the term, because he is a citizen of my State.

Mr. DAWES. There is no doubt that he did.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the amendment may now be agreed to. I think it is fully understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to strike out lines 46 to 49 of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived, the Senate takes a recess until half past seven.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 55 to 60, as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the rate of $1,800 dollars per annum from the date of his appointment till the close of the Forty-fourth Congress, such sum as shall be sufficient to pay said salary after deducting any amount said clerk shall have already received.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. By a mistake of the printer the two preceding paragraphs were not indicated to be stricken out. The committee move to strike out those words, from line 50 to 54, inclusive, as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay the following-named persons the sums severally due them, namely:

To Adolph Erdman, for clerical services rendered the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, $45.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, to strike out from lines 50 to 54, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 72 to line 74, as follows:

For wages of certain folders and laborers in the folding-rooms under the Doorkeeper of the House, $72.39.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 85 to line 95, as follows:

To S. I. Warren, for clerical services as clerk to the Committee on Commerce, for eight days' service, $40; and $60 to pay A. R. Searl for wages as riding page for the month of December, 1875.

To J. B. Summers, for clerical services rendered the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, $92.

For the payment of Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith, for services rendered the Treasury Department in the investigation of the fraudulent claim of Sugg Fort, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 101 to line 118, as follows:

For the payment of the following-named persons for reporting testimony before the several committees of the House of Representatives, at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to wit: A. Johns, E. Z. Bailey, F. M. Adams, Eugene Davis, J. M. W. Yerrinton, J. H. White, E. C. Bartlett, C. J. Hayes, J. W. Tooley, J. W. Anderson, Charles H. Lander, D. C. McEwin, F. J. Warburton, H. A. Kirkham, William F. Bonyngε, and E. F. Underhill, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, on accounts to be rendered by them respectively, certified to by the official stenographers to the committees of the House, and approved by the chairmen of the respective committees, and by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts.

To authorize the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay Theo. F. Davidson for thirteen days' service as clerk of the Committee on Patents, at $4 per day, $52.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 129 to line 139, in the following words:

Office of the Congressional Printer:

For the Congressional Printer, $3,600; three clerks, at $1,600 each, $4,800; one clerk, $1,300; messenger, $840; in all, $11,740.

For contingent expenses, office of Congressional Printer, namely: For stationery, postage, advertising, traveling expenses, horses and wagons, and miscellaneous items, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "million," in line 143, to strike out all down to "cents," in line 159, as follows:

One hundred and fifteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, as follows, namely: For wages of persons employed in the public printing, $100,929.75; for materials for the same, $14,570; for paper, $163,000; in all $368,499.75.

For wages of persons employed in the public binding, $36,934.25; for materials for the same, $24,299.50; for lithographing, $10,000; in all, $71,237.75.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Six hundred and twenty-five thousand five hundred and seven dollars and sixty-six cents; and out of the sum hereby appropriated printing and binding may be done by the Congressional Printer to the amounts following, namely:

So as to read:

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, $1,625,507.66; and out of the sum hereby appropriated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 165, after the words "State Department," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-five;" in line 166, after the words "Treasury Department," to strike out "one hundred and eighty" and insert "three hundred;" in line 167, after the words "War Department," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "one hundred and twenty;" in line 169, after the words "Navy Department," to strike out "thirty-nine" and insert "sixty-five;" in line 170, after the words "Interior Department," to strike out "one hundred and thirty-five" and insert "two hundred and twenty-five;" in line 172, after the words "Agricultural Department," to strike out "nine" and insert "fifteen;" in line 173, after the words "Department of Justice," to strike out "six" and insert "ten;" in line 174, after the words "Post-Office, one hundred and," to insert "seventy;" in line 176, after the words "Supreme Court of the United States," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $5,000;" in line 178, after the words "Court of Claims," to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" to insert after line 178 the words "and for both Houses of Congress, $648,507.66;" and in line 181, after the word "cents," to strike out the words "in all, $591,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For printing and binding for the State Department, $25,000; for the Treasury Department, $300,000; for the War Department, $120,000; for the Navy Department, $65,000; for the Interior Department, $225,000; for the Agricultural Department, $15,000; for the Department of Justice, $10,000; for the Post-Office, $175,000; for the Congressional Library, $15,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $20,000; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $5,000; for the Court of Claims, $10,000; and for both Houses of Congress, $648,507.66.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota explain why we make this increase respecting the judicial department. The Judiciary Committee does not know anything about it, and, so far as we are concerned, we do not want to be responsible for any increase. I have no doubt the Senator has information enough, but it is not anything that has come to our knowledge.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee adopted the same amount that was appropriated last year, and also the amount estimated for, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned. If the Senator—who is better advised as to the wants of that Department than I am—thinks that is too much, the committee would be very glad to strike it down. From the best information we could get that was supposed to be the amount necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely meant to say that the Judiciary Committee has no information at all on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. We have none except the estimates and the amount appropriated last year, and the fact that there has been no considerable unexpended balance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wanted to put in a caveat that the increase of these items did not depend on any recommendation of the Judiciary Committee. That is all.

Mr. WINDOM. So far as the Supreme Court is concerned the information the committee has is from the Chief Justice, and as to the Court of Claims from its chief justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 182 to line 256, as follows:

For debates and proceedings of Congress, $100,000: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to employ no workmen not thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by a trial of their skill under his direction; and whenever it becomes necessary for the Public Printer to make purchases of materials not already due under contracts, he shall prepare a schedule of the articles required, showing the description, quantity, and quality of each article, and shall invite proposals for furnishing the same, either by advertisement or circular, as the Joint Committee on Public Printing may direct, and shall make contracts for the same with the lowest bidder, making a return of the same to the Joint Committee on Public Printing, showing the number of bidders, the amounts of each bid, and the awards of the contracts.

That the Joint Committee on Printing of the Senate and House, upon the passage of this act, advertise for proposals for the printing and binding of the debates of Congress for the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and shall award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, who shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the contract; and it shall be the duty of the heads of the various Departments and of the Librarian of Congress, severally, upon the passage of this act, to prepare schedules of the printing and binding required for the year ending June 30, 1877, and to advertise for proposals for executing the same, and shall award the contracts to the lowest responsible bidders, upon good and sufficient surety being given for the prompt and faithful performance of the work: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to submit to the heads of the various Departments and the Librarian of Congress a statement setting forth the cost at the Government Printing Office of the work required; and should the cost set forth by the Government Printer be as low or lower than the bids, then the work shall be executed at the Government Printing Office; and whenever work is executed at the Government Printing Office it shall be the duty of the Public Printer to furnish with each and every document, pamphlet, blank, blank book, with or without printed headings, job of printing or job of binding thus executed, a bill or memorandum setting forth the number of copies; the quantity, weight, cost, and description of paper; the number of pages, the number of thousand ems, printer's measurement; the cost of composition, making up and imposing, proof-reading, correcting, and press-work; the cost, if any, of stereotyping, electrotyping, lithographing, or engraving, including paper and printing; the cost of dry-pressing, folding, gathering, stitching or sewing, and binding, including materials.

That so much of all laws or parts of laws as provide for the election or appointment of Public Printer be, and the same are hereby, repealed, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1876; and the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a suitable person, who must be a practical printer and versed in the art of bookbinding, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office from and after the day aforesaid; he shall be called the "Public Printer," and shall be vested with all the powers and subject to all the restrictions pertaining to the officer now known as the Public Printer; he shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and he shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,500 a year.

That all executive proclamations, all treaties, notices, advertisements, and proposals for contracts, which by law are required to be published in newspapers in the District of Columbia, shall hereafter be published in only two newspapers in said District, to be of opposite politics, and designated by the head of the Department by which such advertisements are issued.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 257 and 258, as follows:

For lithographing and mapping for the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court, and the Court of Claims, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 274, after the word "of," to insert "any of;" in line 275, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "not required for its actual current expenses;" and in line 279, after the word "seventy-six," to insert "and thereafter;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall reserve of any of the revenues of the District of Columbia not required for its actual current expenses a sum sufficient to meet the interest accruing on the 3.65 bonds of the District during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1876, and thereafter, and apply the same to that purpose; and in case there shall not be a sufficient sum of said revenues in the Treasury of the United States at such time as said interest may be due, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay said interest, and the same shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States from time to time, as said revenues may be paid into said Treasury, until the full amount shall have been refunded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as lines 289 to 293:

To pay on behalf of the United States, as a portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, to be drawn only as needed for immediate use, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 294 to line 323 as follows:

To provide a full record of births, marriages, and deaths in the District of Columbia, and for a general sanitary inspection, which shall include the prevention of the exposure for sale of unwholesome food, and the daily inspection of streets, alleys, yards, and all places where nuisances may exist injurious to health, and for the removal thereof, and of all nuisances, including night-soil, beyond the limits of the District of Columbia, and to prevent domestic animals from running at large, and for the protection of the public parks and grounds, $15,920: Provided, That an equal sum shall be paid out of the treasury of the District of Columbia; the combined sum to be expended as follows: For salaries of five members of the board of health, $500 each; treasurer, secretary, attorney, register of vital statistics, who shall each be selected from the board, $300 each in addition to salary as members of the board: Provided, That any two of the above-named offices may be filled by the same person at the discretion of the board; medical sanitary inspector, $1,000; health officer, $2,000; four clerks, $4,800; five sanitary inspectors, $6,000; one pound-master, $1,000; and one messenger, $720; and for rent, $1,320; printing, advertising, stationery, and blanks, $1,000; transportation of offal, $7,500; laborers and poundmen, $600; disinfectants, $500; postage, fuel, and lights, $400; and contingent expenses, $500.

The amendment was agreed to

The next amendment was to insert after line 323 the following:

To defray the expenses of conducting the sanitary service of the District of Columbia, $18,497: Provided, That the commissioners of the District shall pay concurrently for such service to the board of health a like amount out of the treasury of the District of Columbia, which they are hereby authorized and required to do.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that matter explained a little. It has been currently stated, as every body knows, that the expenses of the board of health of this District have grown to be perfectly prodigious and amount to more than $75,000 a year, if I am correctly informed, and I do not know but still greater amounts. I should be glad to have my friend who is in charge of this bill explain to us the status of the board of health and how much money altogether is spent in their exertions, and then consider whether we cannot provide some more economical method than the present one, as everything of this sort seems to be brought into this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the total amount appropriated in this bill is $36,000 and a fraction over; $18,497 for the Government and the same amount for the District; $36,994 in all. There is also in another bill, the legislative bill, an appropriation for the salaries of the commissioners, making $46,000 in all. The amount appropriated last year was some $62,000. I think it had been more than that before, but as the Senator from Vermont will see we are very decidedly on the down grade, if it has been so high as he names. The committee have carefully examined the detailed estimates of the board, which I have not now before me but are among the papers, and we were unable to see how the amount could be materially reduced. I think a comparison between the sanitary service in the District of Columbia and in other cities will not show that the city of Washington is more expensive than other cities of its size; I think not as expensive. I am inclined to think, too, that it has been well conducted; but on that I have no better opinion, perhaps, than the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SARGENT. On the previous page it will be noticed that the House appropriates about $32,000. We raise the amount but very little.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg Senators not to believe that I am defending the House of Representatives. That is no part of my mission. I am trying to defend the tax-payers of the District and of the United States against what appears to me, if the reported statements are correct, to be an enormous extravagance of some kind or other. Here is a city with 130,000 inhabitants or so, with new streets, new pavements, new everything, which expends certainly about three-quarters of a dollar, when you take it all together, for every man, woman, and child for mere sanitary purposes at a time when there has been no prevailing epidemic or any of those scourges which sometimes sweep over cities and lands, and of course require a great deal of expense to take care of them. Now, it has seemed to me, as it has to a great many other tax-payers in this vicinity, that the sums of money which have been expended for these purposes have been outrageously extravagant in some way. Whether the Committee on the District of Columbia can tell us how or why this is, and whether there is any better way of doing it or of reducing the expenses, I do not know. All that I wish to do is to have the necessary sanitary operations of the District continued so that there shall not be such an enormous disproportion, as I think there is, between expense and benefit. That is the point I wish to get at, if there is any earthly way of doing it. I do not know that there is on the last day of the fiscal year. It is not altogether clear that there is; but the thing might in some way—and I was in hopes the Committee on the District of Columbia would have reported a bill on that subject—be simplified so that in this healthful little town we might get on without paying out what it will turn out when you get the figures all together, last year and the year before, and so forth, according to the statements, runs up to three-quarters of a hundred thousand dollars. Certainly, considering the newness of the city, the wideness of its streets, its generally healthful character and the really rural character of the whole concern, the work ought to be done for less than one-third of the money. That is my opinion; it is no better than anybody else's, and I do not know that there is any way of helping it. I only speak of it to call attention to the subject.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I desire to say that we were not consulted about the appropriations for the board of health. No petition was sent to that committee as to any appropriations for the board of health. I think this is a very extravagant appropriation. I am not satisfied, and I would like to hear something further about it. I hope the Senator who has the matter in charge will explain further about it.

Mr. WEST. I rise to ask the Senator from Vermont for an explanation of his remark that the whole expenditure costs seventy-five cents per capita for every man, woman, and child. He said that it costs three-quarters of a hundred thousand dollars. The total amount appropriated this year by this bill is $36,000, and the amount appropriated by another bill $10 000, making a total of $46,000. As I divide that into the aggregate population of 130,000, I make it twenty-eight cents apiece, and I think it is quite as reasonable and quite as economical an expenditure as attends the administration of health in any other city of the same population.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend's arithmetic is capital; but when he goes to the bottom of the Treasury of the United States, and to the bottom of the treasury of the District of Columbia, and to the bottom of all the money that is collected for fines and forfeitures for disobeying the sanitary laws of this District, and puts all the money together that out of somebody and some way comes into the disposition of these people, he will find it does not stand exactly on the same foundation.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont how you are to get to the bottom of the Treasury of the United States except by appropriation. There is no money except what is here specified; and whatever accrues from fines is a different matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course it is; and that is one of the convenient ways we have of splitting expenses into different bills and into different funds; so that every time there is a criticism or an inquiry our attention is called to one bill, and what we propose to do in that. That is not the way to get at the total expense of things. I was not saying, nor will anything I said bear such an inference, that the amount appropriated by this bill, or that was expected to be spent in the coming year, amounted to seventy-five cents a head, which would be $80,000 or so. I was saying that according to my information, which I believe to be true but do not know to be true, the expenses have hitherto run about $75,000 when you put them all together; that somebody's money has been spent to that extent; and whether you say it comes out in one bill or in another bill does not make any great difference to the tax-payer.

Mr. WINDOM. I think there is a misapprehension—it does not exist, I suppose, in the mind of my friend from Vermont, because he has advised himself about the matter, and I know it does not in mine—as to the duties which this board of health are required to perform. The various acts of Congress have imposed upon that board, I think, much greater duties, much broader duties, than are usually performed by boards of health. I will read one or two extracts from the statutes of Congress. Section 72 of the Revised Statutes provides that the board of health for the District are to declare—

What shall be deemed nuisances injurious to h alth, and to provide for the removal thereof; to make and enforce regulations to prevent domestic animals from running at large in the cities of Washington and Georgetown; to prevent the sale of unwholesome food in said cities; and to perform such other duties as shall be imposed upon said board by the Legislative Assembly.

The act of Congress of June 23, 1874, provides:

That it shall be the duty of the board of health of the District of Columbia to make and enforce regulations to secure a full and correct record of vital statistics, including the registration of deaths and the interment of the dead in said District.

The duties imposed by acts of the Legislative Assembly are—

To consider and determine upon the necessity of draining vacant lots and unoccupied premises into public or private sewers bordering thereon, and to enforce the law through the courts whenever necessary.

Also—

To make, issue, and enforce orders, regulations, and instructions to prevent the introduction and spread of infectious and contagious diseases in the District of Columbia.

Also duties imposed by the commissioners of the District—

To provide for the care of the sick poor of the District, furnishing medical attendance and medicines for the same.

Also—

To provide for the burial of deceased paupers.

Also—

To provide for the collection of garbage in the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the suburbs thereof, and for the removal of the same beyond the limits of the District of Columbia.

The committee having carefully examined their estimate—desirous as the Senator from Vermont is to make the amount as low as possible—were unable, in their judgment, to reduce it below what they have recommended. I believe a careful examination of the doings of this board of health will prove that there is no better-conducted sanitary service in the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that may be so. How much does the committee increase the appropriation in the House bill?

Mr. WEST. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us strike off the $2,500, and stick to what it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays; I fear we have not a quorum, and if so we might as well adjourn.

Several SENATORS. O, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the amendment be reserved.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think we ought to reserve it. I think we had better find out whether we can get along with business to-night.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the question by division.

There were on a division—ayes 14, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to adjourn, but I want to begin to make a record on this question of the extravagance of this performance. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Bontwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Ferry, Hamlin, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Randolph, Sargent, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, McCreery, Maxey, Robertson, and Wadleigh—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—46.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum present. The number lacks ten.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the names of the absentees be called.

The motion was agreed to; and the Secretary called the names of the absentees.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I am aware that it is out of order to indulge in debate during the absence of a quorum, but as some statements have been made by the Senator from Vermont in regard to the expense of the health department, I should like his permission and that of the Senate to correct a few of the errors into which he has fallen in regard to the expense of this service and the duties that have been performed by the board during the past year. I hold in my hand the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the year 1875, and I ascertain from this that the duties devolving upon that board are—

First. General sanitary service, including the daily inspection of streets, alleys, lots, yards, &c., where nuisances injurious to health may exist, and provide for the removal thereof, and for clerical work and supplies.

Second. To prevent domestic animals from running at large in the cities of Washington and Georgetown; for the protection of public parks, grounds, &c.

Third. To prevent the sale of unwholesome food in the District of Columbia.

Fourth. The removal of all offal, including night-soil, garbage, and dead animals, beyond the limits of the District, aggregating many thousands of tons.

Fifth. To secure a full and correct record of vital statistics, including the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, and the interment of the dead.

Sixth. To prevent the introduction and spread of infectious and contagious diseases.

Seventh. Collection of garbage in the cities of Washington and Georgetown and suburbs thereof.

Eighth. The care of the sick poor, furnishing medical attendance and medicines for the same.

Ninth. The burial of deceased paupers.

During the past year, ending June 30, 1875, Congress appropriated $32,220. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the amount appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Appropriated for what?

Mr. INGALLS. For the entire purposes of the board of health for the year 1875.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Including salaries, office rent, contingent expenses, &c.?

Mr. INGALLS. Including salaries, office expenses, and all other matters devolved on the board. I find that the amount appropriated by Congress was $32,220; the amount appropriated by the District of Columbia was precisely the same, making an aggregate of $64,440, which was expended by the board during the past year, so that the amount appropriated by Congress was a little rising $30,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from Kansas is right. He is undoubtedly right as far as he has gone.

Mr. INGALLS. I have gone to the extent that the report shows.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Gone as far as sanitary regulations will allow, I suppose.

Mr. INGALLS. And in addition to the statement of the amount appropriated, there is also a detailed statement in tabulated form of the disbursements and expenditures down to the very last cent. There have been no irregular or unaccounted expenditures, but the full amount of disbursements, showing for what paid and to whom paid, with the date of the payment, appears here in full; and from my observation of the sanitary condition of this and other cities I think I am justified in saying that the sanitary condition of this city is better, that the death rate is lower, and that the general condition of the public health is higher and better here than in any other city on the American continent. I believe that the money is well expended, that the health officers are intelligent, that they perform their duties strictly, and that the money could not be appropriated for a better purpose and could not be disbursed by a better board.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I shall be very glad indeed if it turns out that my information, which was obtained from a gentleman who had no interest in the question except a public one and whose character I believe to be unimpeachable—at any rate he has been a candidate for President of the United States within the last six months——

Mr. INGALLS. That is very indefinite.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And who has gone through the whole thing. If I correctly understood him, he represented to me that the expense was a good deal more than $75,000. If it turns out to be less and in the sixties, I shall be just as glad as my friend is. Still I think when you compare the expense of the sanitary protection of this city, even at $60,000, with that of other cities in temperate, healthy climates like this, of the same size, it will appear to be decidedly in excess here of that in other cities whose death rate is not essentially different from that here. I may be mistaken about that, however.

Mr. INGALLS. I think if the Senator will examine the vital statistics of this and other cities he will find that the death-rate is lower here than in any other city in the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that it is. The Senator means, of course, a city of the same size.

Mr. INGALLS. I mean the percentage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of any city in the Union?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is greatly mistaken about that. I know two cities in the State of Vermont——

Mr. INGALLS. Perhaps nobody dies there at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That people do not die very often there is perfectly true. They drink nothing but water, and breathe nothing but air, and eat nothing but bread and meat and potatoes, and they live a good while, it is true, and come around at tax-paying time with considerable regularity.

Mr. CONKLING. And when they go they dry up and blow away. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. And when they go away they dry up and blow over into the State of New York, where there is plenty of room for them to rest for the remainder of their period.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not know where all the debris came from that there is in the State of New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will find out if you keep on. [Laughter.] I suppose there is no considerable object in this debate at this time, as there is nobody to vote; and I will reserve what I have to say seriously, besides what I have said on this subject, until we have a quorum, and get the facts together. If I have overstated it on my information I shall be very glad indeed to correct it. It seems, according to my friend's statement, that I am about $10,000 too high at this present time.

Mr. SARGENT, (at eight o'clock and six minutes p. m.) I suggest that a number of Senators have come in since the want of a quorum was disclosed. Is there not a quorum now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators have come in, but the number present still lacks six of a quorum.

Several Senators having come in,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll again on this amendment. The Chair thinks there is a quorum present.

Mr. EATON. There should be a fact stated which was stated before when several of the Senators now here were not present. The honorable Senator from Kansas was entirely wrong in his statement as to the death rate. He said that it was less here than in any other city in the Union. It is more than it is in New Orleans, in Richmond, in Charleston, in New Haven, in Hartford, and, in my judgment, in many other cities in the United States.

Now, I desire to say, taking the city of New Haven, in my State, with about half the population of Washington, that the expense there is not more than one-fourth what it is in this city. It strikes me that these facts ought to be known. I certainly desire to vote for as large a sum as is necessary, but let us vote understandingly, and not vote under the impression that the death rate in this city is less than it is in any other city in the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. In speaking of the death rate I referred to the deaths from diseases that are known as zymotic, as infectious or contagious diseases, diseases that originate from the outward sanitary condition of the city itself, and not to those which result from accident or from old age or anything of that kind, and I repeat the assertion that from all those causes against which sanitary regulations can provide the death rate is lower in Washington than in any other city on this continent, and my statement is borne out by statistics.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Sargent, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—21.

Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—36.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with, a quorum being present. The reading of the bill will be continued.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the heading "revenue-cutter service," to strike out in the clause appropriating "for the pay of captains, lieutenants, engineers, and pilots, and for rations for the same, and for pay of petty-officers," &c., the following words from line 394 to line 401:

Seven hundred and forty-seven thousand, six hundred and forty-seven dollars and nineteen cents, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the same purpose for the service of the fiscal year 1874, which is hereby continued and rendered available for the year ending June 30, 1877.

And in lieu thereof to insert—

Nine hundred thousand five hundred and thirty dollars and fifty-nine cents.

Mr. EATON. Unless there is some reason for raising this amount so much above what the House proposed I shall object to the proposition.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire, for the benefit of the Senator from Connecticut, to make an explanation of this amendment. The Senate committee has adopted the rule to make no appropriations of unexpended balances, and for years that has been the rule of the Senate, for the reason that the system of appropriating unexpended balances results in a loose mode of keeping accounts, and there is no responsibility to Congress; we know nothing about the amounts we appropriate. It is a very convenient way for either House, which desires to make the appropriations appear less than they are actually, to appropriate unexpended balances; and this is a very fine illustration of that thing. I will call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut especially to it.

The unexpended balance appropriated by the House bill in this clause amounts to $127,352.81, so that, instead of permitting that unexpended balance to revert to the Treasury at the end of the year and appropriating an amount necessary for the service which would appear upon the face of the bill, as the bill came to the Senate, it simply appropriated, without naming the sum, this unexpended balance; and, therefore, in this item alone the appropriations in this bill appear to be, and are, $127,000 less than they really are.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate committee desire that the appropriations shall appear honestly on the face of the bill, so that everybody may know what they are, so that Congress may know, so that the attention of the Senator from Connecticut and of every other Senator may be brought directly to them, and that when we come to foot up the sum-total of the appropriation bills we may know exactly what they are. Now, the Senate committee instead of re-appropriating that balance in that way took the amount appropriated last year and deducted from it the unexpended balance, and appropriated that sum, assuming that we had appropriated more than was necessary last year by the unexpended balance that remains on hand. I think, Mr. President, that it will address itself to the judgment of the Senator from Connecticut that this is the honest, fair, open way of making appropriations.

Mr. EATON. It addresses itself to my judgment now that I understand what I did not before; and I understand another thing, too, and that is that the appropriation is larger as it comes from the Senate committee than the House appropriation. That I understand if I took the figures correctly from the honorable Senator from Minnesota. He says the balance was one hundred and twenty-seven thousand and some odd hundred dollars. The appropriation is $747,647, so that the appropriation is enlarged at all events.

I am not prepared to say that my friend who last addressed the Chair may not be right in his view that a certain sum should be appropriated, but he ought to have had the candor to state to the Senator from Connecticut and to the Senate that the appropriation is larger as it comes from his committee than as it comes from the House; not much I agree, but still larger, about $30,000 larger. My friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] says more than that. I did not make the figuring.

Mr. WEST. It is $26,000 more.

Mr. EATON. I thought it was about $30,000; my friend from Missouri thought it was more. It would have been quite as well, while my friend from Minnesota was addressing me with the triumphant air which he did, giving me a great deal of information, to have added also that the committee of the Senate increased this appropriation some $25,000 or $30,000. My question is, is that necessary?

One thing is certain, that by the action of the House of Representatives the unexpended balance is appropriated. I am very glad to learn how much that is; and it is very proper that we should know what the amount is. Now, added to that, the House has said so much more; but that is not sufficient to answer the purpose of the honorable Senator; he desires still more than that. The reason he has not yet given why there should be this large addition to what the House bill appropriates. He has given a reason, and I accord to him the full force of his reasoning, that the Senate ought to know exactly what is the amount appropriated.

Mr. WINDOM. I regret if in replying to the honorable Senator from Connecticut I did so with an air of triumph, for I certainly felt no such thing. I am exceedingly gratified, however, if I did succeed in giving him any information on the subject, and only regret that I did not give him all that he asked for.

Now, I am aware that there is a slight increase over the House appropriation; but the Senate committee based their recommendation upon the exact amount that was used last year. That amount was found necessary for the public service, and it is $26,500 less than that used the preceding year; and I want to say that this Bureau, I think, has been very economically managed, and certainly has been reducing expenditures. The amount that we appropriate now is considerably less than the estimates, I think over $100,000 less, and the committee have sought in every case to put these appropriations at the lowest figure that it was believed possible to discharge faithfully and fully the important duties required in these Departments.

I want to say further to the Senator that he will find several instances of the same kind in this bill where unexpended balances have been appropriated. The total amount of unexpended balances appropriated by this bill as it comes from the House is $640,693.21. Comparisons are constantly drawn between the bills of this year and last year. We appropriated last year in the corresponding bill $640,000 more than under a careful and economical administration was found absolutely necessary, and it was not expended; and the House bill as it came to us uses that appropriation that was made last year for the purposes of this year. In that way it does not enter into the sum-total of this bill at all, but the comparison is made that here is a large reduction of many millions, and this $640,000 is one of the items of reduction, using the very appropriations that were made last year to the amount of $640,000 for next year's service, and calling that a reduction as against the bill of last year! I mention that for the information of the Senator from Connecticut also.

Mr. EATON. It is not a matter of very much consequence to me, although it seems to be to my honorable friend, that the House have taken this course to appropriate what unexpended balances there may have been, and call that a reduction. I do not desire any capital of that sort. My object, because I see the full necessity of such action, is so far as we can, and I presume that is the object of my honorable friend, to reduce the expenditures of the Government. The condition of the country demands it; and when we can reduce them let us reduce them, not for party capital, but because of the necessity which demands it. We all agree to that.

Now, I have yet to learn that my honorable friend has gone into this revenue-cutter service to the extent that enables him to determine whether the appropriations of the House committee are not sufficient. I see here—

Pilots and for rations for the same, and for pay of petty officers, seamen, cooks, stewards, boys, coal-passers, and firemen, and for rations for the same, and for fuel for vessels, repairs and outfits for same, ship-chandlery and engineers' stores for same, traveling expenses of officers traveling on duty under orders from the Treasury Department, commutation of quarters, and contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, and miscellaneous expenses.

Now, Mr. President, I move to amend this amendment by striking out "$900,530.59" and inserting in lieu thereof "$873,500."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment moved by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. Perhaps I ought to say that this, within a few dollars or a few cents, brings the appropriation precisely to where the House has placed it, throwing out the consideration of the unexpended balance.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to hear from the honorable Senator from Connecticut the facts, if he has any in his possession, tending to show that the service can be maintained for the sum which he proposes.

Mr. EATON. I will give two facts which ought to satisfy my honorable friend. First, the country demands a reduction. That is one fact. Now, for another; and as my friend, like myself, comes from that section of the country which is called Yankeedom, I might as well answer his question by asking him one; and that is, has he any information that he can give to you, Mr. President, and to this Senate that every article that is to be purchased under this bill is not 25 per cent. lower than it was last year? When I put that inquiry to him, of course he does not know; he cannot know. I know generally, and so does my honorable friend, that all the merchandise that may be mentioned in this bill is lower than it was last year. Naval stores and all the articles mentioned in this bill are lower than they were last year. Now, then, I propose to do what the country demands: so far as possible cut down the expenditures here and elsewhere.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the question which the honorable Senator from Connecticut proposed to me would have been a very proper one if I had made any positive proposition to the Senate which I was bound to defend; but, as I had not and he had, it seems to me that the evidence should come from him.

As to what the people want I have this to say: With reference to all the appropriations, as far as I have any vote to give, everything that is necessary for the proper maintenance of the Government, the development of its resources, and the protection of its rights I am prepared to vote the money from the Treasury and tax the people, and I know very well that in the part of the country which the honorable Senator from Connecticut represents that policy will be acceptable.

Now, I have some knowledge about the revenue-marine service, and I know that from 1869 to the year 1876 the expenditure in that branch has been reduced from $1,600,000 a year to the sum expended the last year, something like $900,000; and the service itself has been improved; and I venture to say that there is no branch of the service of the country more economically administered than that, and it is a necessary service. The revenue marine not only protects our commerce, gives assistance to vessels in danger from the seas, but it has during the last seven or eight years done everything that has been done for the enforcement of the neutrality laws on the coasts and especially in reference to Cuba. It is the most active, vigilant, economical navy on the face of the earth. More than thirty ships, each carrying at least one gun and small-arms, manned by officers of capacity who have their places and their promotion by examination and upon merit, have been maintained for less than a million dollars a year.

I believe that whoever may administer the affairs of the Treasury, while we should not make an unnecessarily large appropriation the appropriation should be large enough to carry on the service through the year; and inasmuch as during the last year the money actually appropriated has not been expended, it is safe for us at least to vote enough to keep the vessels on the sea for the protection of the commerce and the observance of the neutrality laws of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (at eight o'clock and thirty-six minutes p. m.) I believe that in all probability if we call the yeas and nays we shall not find ourselves with a quorum, and as I understand the bill extending the appropriations for ten days has been signed and this country in the centennial year may rejoice that for ten days more its Government is to continue, and especially that we may all feel happy and peaceful that we shall get over the Fourth of July by the agreement of the two Houses, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; ayes 8, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 8, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, McCreery, Maxey, Randolph, and Withers—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Christiancy, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—34.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriations for the Judiciary, to strike out the following words from line 444 to line 454:

The allowance to any deputy shall not exceed $5 per day while actually employed, or exceeding $1,200 per year for services rendered by such deputy, and said sums may be reduced below the said rates by the Attorney-General whenever, in his opinion, said reductions should be made: Provided, That all the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the registration of voters and the appointment of supervisors of elections, and the deputy and special deputy marshals, and touching the supervision of elections, are hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained. What is this title of the Revised Statutes that is referred to here?

Mr. WINDOM. I apprehend the Senator from Vermont does not desire to have the Revised Statutes read to which this clause refers. This modest little item in the appropriation bill repeals six pages of the Revised Statutes with reference to the elective franchise. The Senator will find by looking at the proviso that all the provisions of this title "in relation to the registration of voters and the appointment of supervisors of election and the deputy and special deputy marshals, and touching the supervision of elections are hereby repealed." The entire title comprises a very elaborate and exceedingly important statute designed to preserve the purity of elections. The Committee on Appropriations did not feel it to be their duty to go very carefully into an examination of that statute, as in their judgment it was not in the province of that committee to determine whether it should be repealed or not. It had nothing whatever to do with the appropriations in the bill, and it was not a proper subject of legislation in an appropriation bill. I do not desire to go into that question any further at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations striking out the words which have been read.

Mr. EATON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that this question may be divided. The first five lines relate to the pay of deputy marshals in general in reference to their mere duties under the courts. The proviso in the last five lines is on an entirely different subject, and I want to have a separate vote on that. I dare say there is no desire to have the yeas and nays on the first part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut ask for the yeas and nays on the first branch of the amendment?

Mr. EATON. I asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has asked for a division, which is his right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggested that the amendment embraces two entirely distinct propositions, and I asked to have them divided, and suggested that on the first proposition, which relates merely to the pay of deputy marshals, there need not be any yeas and nays taken, as it is a mere matter of detail, and I supposed nobody would care about the provision being kept in this bill, because in respect to a great many deputies it would work an injustice to the Government, and in respect to others it might do some good. At any rate it ought to be considered in another place than this. As to the last part of the proposition, I can see the force of asking for the yeas and nays upon that.

Mr. EATON. I am not anxious in regard to the first part myself; but I think it is important. It is:

> The allowance to any deputy shall not exceed $5 per day while actually employed, or exceeding $1,200 per year for services rendered by such deputy, and said sums may be reduced below the said rates by the Attorney-General whenever, in his opinion, said reductions should be made.

In the first place, in my judgment there is very little necessity for these officers any way. I only regret that my friend from Vermont has divided the matter; but as he has done so, I will not call for the yeas and nays on the first part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not call for the yeas and nays and the Chair will put the question on striking out the first item, being the words preceding the proviso.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say, in reference to the first item, that I have a letter in my hand from the First Comptroller stating that—

> Under existing laws deputy marshals draw no compensation directly from the Government, but are paid by the marshals out of the earnings of their respective offices; which earnings are made up of fees received from individuals as well as from the United States.

Without taking time to read the whole letter, the Comptroller says it is of no sort of use, it will save nothing to the Government and is a question for the marshal himself as to how the whole pay is divided; and on that ground the committee recommend to strike it out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The United States has nothing to do with marshals in respect of their pay. We revised the whole subject of marshals in a bill at the last session, or the session before, making an ample limit so as to protect the United States; and to prove that it works well, every marshal in the United States is grumbling about it, which is a pretty good sign.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the first clause from line 444 to and including the word "made" in line 450.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on striking out the proviso, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to know whether the proposition as to this allowance of $5 per day has been passed upon, or whether the question is now that it shall reach the maximum of $10 per day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first clause of the paragraph has been stricken out by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the amendment of the committee striking out this clause has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion striking out the first clause has been agreed to, and the question is now upon striking out the proviso from line 450 to 454.

Mr. EATON. If I may be permitted, I will withdraw my call for the yeas and nays on striking out the proviso.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist, as the yeas and nays have been ordered, that we have them taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to dispensing with the yeas and nays being called. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KEY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted "yea" inadvertently. I suppose this is regarded as a political question, and I am paired on political questions with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] reserving the right to vote if my vote is necessary to make a quorum. I ask leave to withdraw my vote; but if my vote is necessary to make a quorum I will vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was not aware that this was a political question. If it is, I desire to withdraw my vote in the affirmative, as I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on all political questions.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can hardly be called a political question when the votes are almost all on one side.

Mr. WRIGHT. This question being a political question, I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] on all political questions. This seems to have taken that form. If present he would probably vote "nay," and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] on political questions. If this is to be one, as it seems to be, I shall not vote. The Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. KEY. For the sake of making a quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to withdraw my vote. I made an arrangement with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] that if he was not paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] I would pair with him. The Senator from Arkansas has voted, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not necessary, I think, for the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw his vote. The Senator from North Carolina made an arrangement with the Senator from Arkansas, but the effect of his vote does not change anything, and I hope that the Senator from New Jersey will not withdraw his vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, and West—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Randolph, and Withers—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—36.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (at nine o'clock and two minutes p. m.) I venture to move that the Senate adjourn. It is very hot and uncomfortable here.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow us to have an executive session for a few moments? There is some important business which will not take more than three or four minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield for a motion for an executive session.

Mr. WINDOM. I know the question is not debatable; but I think it is very desirable to go on an hour longer with this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this debatable?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope we shall go on and finish up this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Senator from Vermont yields to the Senator from California. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn—ayes 8, noes 30.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 468, to increase the appropriation "for defraying the contingent expenses of the courts, and the fees, per diem, and traveling expenses of the United States marshal in the Territory of Utah," &c., from $20,000 to $43,000.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to be heard upon that amendment, if there is to be a serious division in the Senate. I supposed some explanation might be necessary. Senators will observe in lines 469 and 470 this provision:

> This amount to be in full for all matters covered herein as against the United States.

That clause will have to be stricken out or else the amendment which is pending will have to be adopted, from the fact that the United States by former statutes have imposed upon the marshal duties which cannot be performed for $20,000. By the bill called the Poland bill, the discussion of which is very well remembered by many Senators on the floor, it was provided that the prosecution of a certain class of offenses should be conducted, and the summoning of witnesses, the arrest and detention and care of prisoners, &c., should be performed by the United States marshals. The Territory of Utah thereupon considered that its treasury was relieved from the necessity of paying these expenses, because the duties which in other Territories were devolved on territorial officers were taken out of the hands of the United States marshal. On account of the anomalous condition of things in that Territory the majority of the Senate and of the House thought that legislation was necessary and beneficial.

I remember I had some doubt personally with regard to that legislation, and it was modified in some slight respects owing to some objections which I brought forward to some features of it; but the principle of the legislation so far as it devolved duties upon the United States marshal was retained.

I have in my hands a very careful estimate of the expenses of the different courts at their different terms, the expenses of the penitentiary, the number of prisoners, the amount that it costs to keep them, and all made obviously with regard to economy and the actual necessity for the service. That amount figures up a little more than the amount of the amendment which is reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It is absolutely necessary for this service, unless we repeal the laws which require the prosecution of certain offenses, to be made at the expense of the United States. I can have the document which I hold in my hand read, although it is somewhat long; but I think the statement which I have made is a fair abstract of its contents.

The Senate would be requiring the officers of the United States Government in that Territory to make bricks without straw, to perform an impossibility, if we should require these duties of them and give them only half the amount which is necessary to discharge the duties. It is not a question of economy; it is a question of executing the laws of the United States. If this appropriation is not made the prisoners, who have depredated there upon the community and violated the laws of the United States, will be turned loose upon the community and justice will entirely fail. I think this explanation is due to the Senate, and I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. EATON. I suppose the theory of the Senator from California is that there is to be a violation of the criminal law in the coming year over that of last year, and therefore he estimates that this appropriation must be $43,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not say that that is my theory. I judge by experience.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 728) for the relief of Martha J. Coston.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2626) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the officers and soldiers engaged in the war with Mexico the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 473, to increase the appropriation "for expenses to be incurred in the prosecution and collection of claims due the United States" from $2,500 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 474 to line 476, as follows:

For defraying the expenses of defending claims under the convention with Mexico of the 4th of July, 1868, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriation for the Government Hospital for the Insane, in line 504, after the word "repairs," to insert "and improvements;" and in line 505, after the word "institution," to strike out "five" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For general repairs and improvements absolutely necessary for the buildings of the institution, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 520, to increase the item "for the support of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying in Asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from pay-patients," from $16,000 to $19,500, and to strike out at the end of the clause the words:

In addition to the unexpended balance of former appropriations, which is hereby made available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 523:

For a Mansard roof for the building, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 531, after the word "the," to strike out the words "Surgeon of the Army" and to insert:

Secretary of the Interior, who shall cause an accurate report to be made monthly of the number of persons so relieved, their names, residence, date of admission, and date of discharge from the hospital.

So as to make the clause read:

For care, support, and medical treatment of seventy-five transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in the Providence Hospital in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with said institution, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall cause an accurate report to be made monthly of the number of persons so relieved, their names, residence, date of admission, and date of discharge from the hospital.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 541 to line 554, as follows:

To the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, $10,000, to be expended in erecting a machine-shop and other needful buildings for the inmates of said industrial school.

Mr. EATON. I am in another role just now. Here is an expenditure of $10,000 that it strikes me is a proper one. I understand that there is an industrial school in this District which is a very worthy object of charity and something which the United States ought to attend to. Therefore, I am in favor of giving the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia $10,000 to be expended in erecting a machine-shop and other needful buildings. From information which I have received to-day from outside, it strikes me that this is an exceedingly proper appropriation. I should like some reason to be given why this appropriation should not be retained.

Mr. WINDOM. The information the committee have on the subject is that this is a worthy institution undoubtedly, and is doing a great deal of good; but it is an institution for which the Government has not yet made any appropriation. It is well known that whenever the Government takes one of these benevolent institutions in the District of Columbia under its charge it has continually to appropriate for it. We had not begun to do that in former years, and I do not think this is a good year to begin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that the reason why the appropriation for Saint Ann's Asylum on the next page is stricken out?

Mr. WINDOM. That is the reason.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 556 to line 558 as follows:

For Saint Ann's Infant Asylum of Washington, $10,000; and for Georgetown General Hospital, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the Smithsonian Institution, line 561, to increase the item "for preservation of the collections of the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government" from $5,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 562:

For expenses of making up into sets for distribution to colleges and academies the duplicate ores, minerals, and objects of natural history now belonging to the United States, or in the collections at the centennial exhibition, which have been presented to it by foreign governments, to include the cost of packing and shipping of the latter to Washington, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 581, to increase the appropriation "for compensation in lieu of moieties in certain cases under customs-revenue laws" from $125,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 582:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have the rebel archives and records of captured property examined and information furnished therefrom for the use of the Government, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 587 to 595:

Mints and assay offices:
For fitting up an assay laboratory in the office of the Director of the Mint, $1,000.
For three automatic weighing-machines, $6,000.
For coining-presses, draw-benches, milling-machines, cutting-machines, annealing-furnaces, and fitting up the same, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $63,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 621, in the clause appropriating for the "subtreasury and post-office, Boston, Massachusetts:"

For continuation of the building, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 636, to strike out the words "fencing, grading, approaches, and furniture and carpets, $15,000," and to insert, "completing the building, $40,000;" so that the clause will read:

Court-house and post-office, Lincoln, Nebraska: For completing the building, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 645 and 646, as follows:

Assay office, Helena, Montana: For repayment for site of building, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from the clause appropriating "for the removing and reconstruction of the building now on the lot and premises in Jersey City, New Jersey, belonging to the United States, for the purpose of a post-office," the following words from line 650 to line 653:

All the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for purchasing the said lot and premises for the site of a post-office building in said city, and also in addition thereto the sum of.

To be used in completing the foundation and setting stone for the first story.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 667, to increase the appropriation "for the continuation of the building for appraisers' stores, San Francisco, California," from $50,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 672, to increase the appropriation for the continuation of the State, War, and Navy Department building from $250,000 to $600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 686, to increase the appropriation for the continuation of the building for the court-house and post-office, Saint Louis, Missouri, from $450,000 to $600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 689, to increase the appropriation for completion of court-house and post-office building in New York from $250,000 to $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 690 to insert:

For custom-house and post-office building at Albany, New York, $50,000; and the cost of said building shall not exceed the sum of —— dollars.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to fill the blank with $600,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 703, to increase the appropriation for annual repairs of the Treasury building, Washington, from $10,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 750, to insert:

For the construction of a light-house and fog-signal at Nubble Head, Maine, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines 757 to 759 as follows:

For building a light-ship with steam fog-signal for an outside station and for shore purposes, $50,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask my colleague from Minnesota, who has charge of the bill, if, on further information received by the committee, this amendment is not agreed to be withdrawn?

Mr. WINDOM. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. There ought to be one modification there. The words "and for shore purposes" should be stricken out.

Mr. SARGENT. It might be left to stand as it is, and it can be considered in conference.

Mr. ALLISON. This is for a light-ship twenty miles in the ocean off the Delaware Capes.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee striking out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. Before going to page 33, after the amendment in line 757 I move to insert:

For constructing signal-light on the Crib-House in Lake Michigan, in front of the city of Chicago, $5,000.

A bill for this object was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and they, not having a quorum, have not acted upon it.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator had better wait until the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are through.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator in charge of the bill suggests that I wait until the amendments of the committee are through. I have no objection to that course, and I will offer it then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following words from lines 800 to 803:

And the unexpended balance of the appropriation for a screw-pile light-house at Tybee Knoll, Savannah River, made by the act approved March 3, 1873, is hereby made available for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 804, to insert the word "for" at the beginning of the clause; and in line 805, after "Tybee Knoll," to insert "Savannah River, $12,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the establishment of range-lights to guide through the dredged channel, Tybee Knoll, Savannah River, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 816, to increase the appropriation "for establishing temporary lights along the line of the dredged channel, Maumee Bay, Ohio," from $4,000 to $7,000; and to strike out from the end of the clause the following words:

In addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for two day-beacons in said bay made by the act of June 23, 1874, which is hereby continued and made available for this purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 821, to insert:

For building a light-house and steam fog-signal station at Little Traverse, Michigan, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 824 and 825, as follows:

For range-lights at the mouth of Cheboygan River, in the State of Michigan, $10,000.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment striking out the item. I think the committee did not understand the condition of the harbor. There never has been an appropriation for building any pier at this harbor, and the bottom being clay, nothing has been done but to dredge it; and while it is enterable in daylight by buoys, it cannot be entered at night except by range-lights, and this appropriation is for the purpose of facilitating the entrance at any time, as the whole shipping passes this way down to the lower lakes from Chicago and Milwaukee. I think the committee could not have understood the condition of the harbor, else they would not have moved to strike out these lines.

Mr. WINDOM. I will say to the Senator that the clause was stricken out for want of information upon the subject.

Mr. FERRY. I hope, on the information I have given to the Senate, they will disagree to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to say a word upon this amendment, and I have a paper to be read in connection with it.

Mr. WINDOM. It has been rejected.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Very well.

Mr. WINDOM. There is another amendment omitted by the committee in printing, which I wish to offer at this point. After line 825 I move to insert:

For building a light-house or fog-bell on Round Island, in the Straits of Mackinac, $15,000.

I will say that a provision passed the Senate for this purpose and the bill is pending in the House, and upon that the committee feel warranted in recommending it.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill passed the Senate at this session?

Mr. WINDOM. At this session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 855, to increase the appropriation "for a rolling-mill and forging-shop (shop F) for the armory at Rock Island arsenal, Rock Island, Illinois," from $80,000 to $170,000; and to strike out at the end of the clause the following words in lines 857, 858, 859, and 860:

In addition to the unexpended balances of appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1874, which are hereby made available for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 860, to insert:

For an iron-working and finishing-shop (shop G) for the arsenal, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 866, to insert:

For removing deposits from pool of water-power, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 886, to insert:

NAVY-YARDS AND STATIONS.

For repairs of the different navy-yards and stations and preservation of the same, $500,000.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to know why it is that so large a sum as half a million of money should be appropriated outside of the naval appropriation bill for purposes which belong to the Navy without a particle of detail given as to where the money is to be applied.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to hear some explanation also.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it is improper, as the number of navy-yards is not great, that this vast sum of money is to be appropriated in gross.

Mr. WINDOM. There are, I believe, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy, some $50,000,000 of property invested in the navy-yards. The House omitted entirely any provision for their preservation and repair. The committee consulted the Secretary of the Navy, and upon his recommendation inserted $500,000 as the lowest sum that can be relied upon to repair them and keep them in a proper condition.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not understand the phraseology of this amendment. I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know what the difficulty is in the mind of the Senator from Nebraska. It is for repair and preservation of the navy-yards and seems to be easily understood. I do not know how to make it any more plain.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have made a mistake. I was referring to the amendment in lines 867 and 868:

For removing deposits from pool of water-power, $25,000.

Mr. WINDOM. That has just been agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. One part of the question of the Senator from Delaware was not answered, why this provision was not put in the naval bill. These repairs and improvements are never put in the naval bill; that is, repairs of the buildings and wharves and permanent structures in the navy-yards themselves. Some fund must be provided to take care of the immense amount of property which the Government has. A roof gets out of order, it leaks, and if there is no fund to repair it, the water runs down and swells the floor and bursts out the walls. A vessel in landing at a wharf knocks out some piles and injures the wharf, and, if left to the action of the tides, or other action, it becomes very much dilapidated. This item covering all the navy-yards and naval stations from Maine away round to the Gulf and on the Pacific coast, a provision is made in the bill about one per cent. on the value of the property in order to preserve it for the coming year; and the committee deemed it economy and it was most strenuously recommended by the Secretary. The House omitted it entirely, although in the estimates there was a much larger amount called for.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I will answer his question. As I understand, he asks why we do not specify to what navy-yards the appropriation is to be applied. For the reason that the sum is so much smaller than that estimated, it was impossible to specify how it should be divided among them, and by taking it in the lump the sum of $500,000 it was believed could be so applied that this property might not suffer material damage. The amount last year was about a million dollars. This is the smallest amount appropriated for many years, and it was lumped in order to enable the Secretary of the Navy to economize and utilize this sum as might be most demanded at the different yards.

Mr. BAYARD. It might be a small sum appropriated for many years past for this purpose and yet be a great deal too large. I have steadily voted for a number of years most liberal sums for the maintenance of the Navy. I have always said that it should not lack money for my vote. Therefore while agreeing that the appropriation be made, I did propose and do still propose to hold those responsible who have wasted money by maintaining a peace establishment at a war cost. I do not propose at this moment, nor is this the bill or the proper occasion, to express my views in regard to the relative expenditures in the naval establishment and the results which we have found after many years of experience; but this I do say, that the system of lumping expenditures by half millions and by millions I trusted was at an end. Last year we appropriated upward of $3,000,000 in a lump for naval expenditures to be spent how we knew not or why we knew not; and it does seem to me that in thus passing upon such large amounts of money we at least should have more details to justify us in the appropriation.

I do not doubt that the naval stations are valuable, nor that the navy-yards are valuable, nor that they have cost a great deal of money, and perhaps a great deal too much money; but we also know that the naval stations and the navy-yards are generally the habitations of mechanics, and this very class of repair is such as can be made with very little expense by any diligent officer who chooses to attend carefully to it. I do not mean to say that there may not be found a proper account for this large expenditure of money; but I observe it did not originate in the House of Representatives, nor am I aware what estimates were regarded or disregarded, or what other appropriations may be found that would lap over and affect this same object; but I shall content myself, in the absence of explanation, by asking for the yeas and nays that I may appear upon the record as opposed to this appropriation.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. A single word, Mr. President. I agree with the Senator from Delaware that appropriations in the lump are not desirable; nor do I believe that, as a general rule, is the best policy; but the committee adopted it in this case because they felt constrained to appropriate a smaller sum of money than was deemed necessary by the Department, and it was impossible to divide it up and specify to what particular navy-yards a given sum should be appropriated; and by appropriating this amount in the lump it was believed that the Secretary of the Navy would be able to preserve this vast amount of property from injury, and to make such absolutely necessary repairs as would preserve the property until next year. Our appropriation in this manner was wholly in the interest, I will not say of economy, because that is a very much worn-out word, but in the interest of as small an amount of expenditure as possible. I doubt whether it is wholly in the interest of economy; but the committee were constrained to appropriate the smallest possible amount of money that the Department believed would suffice for the purpose, and hence put it in this form.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill if he can state approximatively how much below the estimates the appropriation is?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot.

Mr. PADDOCK. And also at the same time what the corresponding aggregate appropriation was last year?

Mr. WINDOM. The aggregate appropriation for all the navy-yards last year was $1,090,000. The total estimate for this year is $1,725,000. This is for all the navy-yards of the country—at Boston, at New London, at Brooklyn, at League Island, at Norfolk, Virginia, at Pensacola, Florida. There is a special appropriation here for Mare Island, and there is a general estimate for repairs and preservation of $500,000. We allowed them that, and deducted all the balance of the estimate. It is $590,000 less than the appropriation last year.

Mr. PADDOCK. This, then, is a great reduction.

Mr. BAYARD. It does seem to me that the logic is the other way than that the Senator seems to think. If the expenditure was so great last year, what is the necessity for continuing it the present year? It seems that every year the rule is to be applied that because a certain sum was spent in 1875, so much the more are you to expend in 1876. If you had this expenditure last year, why was it not enough to maintain these navy-yards and stations in common repair at least for another year? Why, sir, it is certain that there is a want of practical and substantial economy in this thing. To appropriate "for general repairs" without specifications is nothing in the world but an invitation that these amounts shall be spent, and we all know that no appropriation of money was ever made by Congress that the Departments did not find means of using.

Mr. WINDOM. Why, Mr. President, there are over $600,000 in this bill that they did not use this year.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Ingalls, Key, Maxey, and Withers—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 891 and 892:

For continuing the work on the dry-dock at Mare Island, California, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as line 893:

For the purchase of torpedoes, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 910, in the appropriations for buildings and grounds in and around Washington, to increase the appropriation "for manure and hauling of the same" from $2,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 932 and 933, as follows:

To aid in the completion of monument in commemoration of the colored race, $3,000.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to have an explanation of that.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee struck it out because they had no explanation of it. We were not aware that the colored race was extinct yet, and therefore could not see the object of completing a monument "in commemoration of the colored race." I do not know but that our friend from Mississippi who has recently been there may be able to give some reasons why this appropriation should be made, but the committee certainly had none at the time they considered the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. It seems to me the House of Representatives must have had some information on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. It may have been; but the Committee on Appropriations had not any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment to strike out the item.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 937, after the word "Capitol," to insert the word "and;" in line 938, to strike out the words "and Executive Mansion;" and in line 941, to strike out the words "fuel for watchmen's lodges and for green-houses at the nursery, $51,000," and insert "$32,000, to be expended under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol;" so as to make the clause read:

For lighting the Capitol, and grounds about the same, including Botanical Garden, for gas, pay of lamp-lighters, gas-fitters, plumbers and plumbing, lamps, lamp-posts, matches, materials for the electrical battery and repairs of all kinds, $32,000, to be expended under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 944, to insert:

For lighting the Executive Mansion, namely, for gas, pay of lamp-lighters, gas-fitters, plumbers and plumbing, lamps, lamp-posts, matches, and repairs of all kinds, fuel for watchmen's lodges and for green-houses at the nursery, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 957, to insert:

For repairs of Georgetown reservoir, $4,000.
For improvement and care of all the various public reservations, $16,000.
For graveling roadways in the Mall between Four-and-a-half and Sixth streets, (over the site of the old Agricultural Garden,) $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the miscellaneous appropriation for the Capitol, to strike out lines 973, 974, and 975, as follows:

For improving the Capitol grounds and for paving roadway and foot-walks in the Capitol grounds, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 975, to insert:

For taking up and renewing floor of the Senate Chamber and re-arranging the flues for more equal distribution of air through the registers of the floor, $4,000.
For paving roadways east court, and foot-walks of the Capitol grounds, $150,000.
For continuing the improvements of the Capitol grounds, including the foot-walks of the west side of the Capitol, $75,000
For an additional steam-boiler for the heating-apparatus in the Senate wing of the Capitol and for repairs to gas-pipes in the Capitol building, $8,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to modify the amendment on line 178, as it was a mistake of the committee; it should have been $5,000, and was intended to be by the committee, instead of $4,000. Therefore the first of these items should be $5,000 instead of $4,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after line 989, to insert:

For improvement of Senate elevator, $2,000.

Mr. WEST. The suggestion was made by the Committee on Appropriations just as it was closing its session to have the elevator improved. The amount fixed in the amendment, I understand from consultation with the architect of the Capitol and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, is not sufficient. I move to make the amount $5,000 instead of $2,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that $5,000 ought to build an elevator in the St. Nicholas Hotel, instead of being the amount needed to improve one in this building.

Mr. WEST. That is very true; but the St. Nicholas Hotel is not half as big as this Capitol, and we want to get as good an elevator as that in the St. Nicholas. The language used is "improvement," and it is an improvement, because it is not intended to build an elevator entire; the hole is cut out; but the sum of $5,000 is necessary to give you a proper elevator, which you have not now.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is an elevator here.

Mr. SARGENT. We understand that this elevator is dangerous; that it is liable to give way at any time, and sacrifice anybody who may be in it. I was in favor of $2,000, and was not aware that it would cost as much as $5,000. I should like to add, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," so as to be an indication that we do not want $5,000 expended if it can be helped.

Mr. WEST. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, if there be no objection.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriation for the "survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts," after the word "navigation," in line 1059, to strike out the words:

And for a survey of said river from Cairo to New Orleans, together with its various outlets to the Gulf, with a view of ascertaining the most effectual method of protecting the alluvial lands bordering upon its banks from overflow.

So as to make the clause read:

Survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts: For every purpose and object necessary for and incident to the continuation of the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, and the Mississippi River to the head of ship navigation, with soundings and observations of deep-sea temperatures in the Gulf Stream and the Gulf of Mexico, and observations of currents along the same coasts, and the preparation, engraving, lithographing, and issuing of charts, the preparation and publication of the Coast Pilot and other results of the Coast Survey, the purchase of materials therefor, and including compensation of civilians engaged in the work, and pay and subsistence of engineers for the steamers engaged on those coasts, $325,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1107, to insert:

For difference between the amount appropriated and the amount of rent for buildings No. 211 New Jersey avenue south and No. 215 South Capitol street for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. The amendment between lines 1059 and 1063 was passed over inadvertently on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WINDOM. I understand those words were put in by mistake in the House.

Mr. GORDON. Very well. I find the same point is covered in another portion of the bill.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 1140, in the clause making appropriation for expenses of the national currency, to increase the item "for paper, engraving, printing, express charges, and other expenses," from $175,000 to $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1144, to increase the appropriation "for transportation of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States" from $25,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1148, to insert:

Provided, That not more than $1,000 of this appropriation may be expended for rent of an office for the Commissioner.

So as to make the clause read:

Inquiries respecting food-fishes: For continuing the inquiry into the cause of the decrease of food-fishes of the coast, of the rivers, and of the lakes of the United States, $5,000: Provided, That not more than $1,000 of this appropriation may be expended for rent of an office for the Commissioner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1180, to increase the appropriation "for furniture and repairs of furniture and carpets for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department" from $75,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1185, to increase the appropriation "for pay of custodians and janitors for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department" from $50,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1192, to insert:

For temporary clerks of the Treasury Department, $40,000; and for temporary clerks in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, $20,000.

Mr. EATON. I hope there will be an explanation of this. We have passed several millions without one word being said. This is a provision "for temporary clerks of the Treasury Department, $40,000; and for temporary clerks in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, $20,000." There is $60,000 for temporary clerks. First, I will ask, for information, as I am very much in need of it, what is the meaning of these "temporary clerks?" Let us know.

Mr. LOGAN. When you send a resolution to the Treasury Department for information, they have to employ additional clerks to give it to you. That is what it means.

Mr. EATON. As I have not time to send to the Treasury Department, I am asking my distinguished friend from Minnesota——

Mr. LOGAN. I mean when the Senate or House sends a resolution.

Mr. EATON. I understand the Senator.

Mr. WINDOM. We have for many years made an appropriation for temporary clerks in the Treasury Department because at certain seasons of the year there is a great pressure, and this is to give a little elasticity to it, so that when the exigency arises additional clerks may be used; and as we have at both ends of the Capitol cut down the force to the lowest possible number that it is believed can do the duties of that Department—I mean the majority——

Mr. SARGENT. The regular duties.

Mr. WINDOM. The regular force I mean. The Senator from Connecticut shakes his head. Evidently in his judgment we have not cut it down to the lowest number, but in the judgment of the majority we have done so; and as we have for a long time given them this temporary force for the exigencies that may arise, we deem it peculiarly important that it be done now. That is the purpose of it. I do not know that I can make any more full explanation.

Mr. EATON. I desire to state a fact here. I stated it once before on another bill, but it is quite as proper that it should be restated now. A committee was appointed by the Senate last spring. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] was chairman of the committee; I had the honor of being a member of that committee. Some time was spent in the various Departments here for the purpose of looking into a re-organization of the Departments. It was suggested by members of that committee that there should be one hour per day more labor performed by the employés than had been performed. I understood from my friend from Minnesota that that request had been complied with, and that the employés were put to one more hour of labor. There are about five thousand, I think fifty-one hundred, employés in the various Departments of the Government. This, however, I agree would not apply to all the employés, for I am very happy to say that in the examination, short as it was, that I had the opportunity to give, I found clerks who worked overtime good officers. I know there were others that do not work. Now, suppose you call it, not five thousand, but two thousand hours a day of additional labor. If it was performed, you would not require these temporary clerks, and it is nonsense to talk about it.

If temporary clerks were required last year they are not this year, when two thousand men are employed one hour a day more than they were last year. I ask the Senate to look at it deliberately. My friend and I had a little colloquy on this subject the other day, and I said then that the business could be done with less clerks than the House bill called for; and were I at liberty I should like to ask a question of one of the leading members on this floor who does not belong to the same political side that I do as to what is his opinion. I tell you, sir, that with clerks who work as you work (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) in your business and I in mine, seven hours a day, thirty-five hundred instead of five thousand can do the duties of the public here. The reduction has been, if I remember aright, about three or four hundred.

Mr. WINDOM. The reduction made by the Senate was about three hundred and eighteen, I think.

Mr. EATON. I mean the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. The reduction proposed by the House was ten or twelve hundred.

Mr. EATON. It ought to have been fifteen hundred. It was but ten or eleven hundred; but the reduction made by the Senate was three hundred and eighteen, my friend says. Now, sir, I undertake to say—and if my honorable friend can contradict me in argument let him do so—that if there is one hour per day put upon the clerks of the Treasury Department more than there was a year ago and but three hundred have been removed in all the Departments of the Government, you do not require this additional $60,000; and, if it is not required, we ought not to vote it. That is certain.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not very distinctly understand the Senator from Connecticut, because I cannot presume that he argues that because we have reduced the force three hundred this year therefore we can get along without the $60,000 for temporary clerks better than last; but that was, as I understood, his argument. In any event, I apprehend the reduction will be more than three hundred clerks. Certainly, if the House should accept the Senate propositions, it will be a reduction of some 7 per cent. upon the total clerical force.

Now, I think that this provision—and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to that—is in the line of economy; and I know that is the line on which he is fighting; and if I can convince him that it is in the line of economy I am quite sure I shall have his support for this amendment.

It is quite impossible to provide a regular force that will not be too great during the recess of Congress or too small during the session, and by having this comparatively small sum, that can be used whenever the pressure is greatest, you do not require so large a regular force as you otherwise would. I think the Senator will see very clearly that the force required to perform the duties in the Department during the recess cannot perform them when Congress is constantly calling on the Departments for reports, some of them very voluminous; one, I think, called for at this session required the services of twenty-odd clerks for a considerable length of time; but by having this fund, which can be drawn upon in cases of that kind, you do not require so large a regular force as you otherwise would. The committee proposed this amendment upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe it to be in the line of economy; that a smaller regular force can be employed, and that money will be saved by it.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, it was my own fault and not that of my distinguished friend that I did not make him understand me. He now says that the force will be reduced much more than three hundred and eighteen. Then I apprehend either that I did him some little good the other day or that he has acquired information from other sources.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me a word at that point?

Mr. EATON. I will.

Mr. WINDOM. I said that I presumed the force would be reduced to a greater extent than that. I for one stand ready to reduce the force below what I believe is absolutely necessary for the prompt discharge of the duties of that Department in order to save the appropriation bill; and I am willing as a member of the conference committee on that subject to cripple the service rather than to destroy it; and hence I am willing to go below the reduction that the Senate has proposed, although I believe that the reduction proposed by the Senate is as low as the service will justify, but I would rather cripple than destroy it.

Mr. EATON. I am very sorry to hear my friend say that he would rather cripple the service. I would not cripple it at all. Now let us look at the argument of my distinguished friend one moment. He asks us to appropriate—

For temporary clerks of the Treasury Department, $40,000, and for temporary clerks in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, $20,000.

In the next breath he admits that the conference committee will cut down the service. How my honorable friend can require an appropriation of $60,000 before he knows what the conference committee is going to do is more than I can figure. If I knew that the conference committee were about to reduce the force of the various Departments to a point where I believed with good clerks and proper work the service of the Government could be done, then I should be perfectly willing to vote for the $60,000 for temporary clerks, or so much thereof as might be necessary; but until that thing is done, I submit to my honorable friend that he makes out no case here, and no Senator with the argument of my distinguished friend in his face can vote for that appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment inserting the clause from line 1193 to line 1196.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 1203, to insert the words "House of Representatives for the;" and in line 1205, to strike out the words "the three named gentlemen" and insert "them;" so as to make the clause read:

That the sum of $302.40 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to Henry Cliff, Charles S. Risinger, and Charles E. Diemer, for services rendered as folders for the House of Representatives for the month of February, 1874, to be divided equally between them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1221, to increase the appropriation for the Signal Service from $300,000 to $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line 1238 to line 1243 the following words:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation for sea-coast defenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, is hereby continued and made available for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

And insert:

Eighteen thousand dollars.

So as to make the clause read:

For military surveys and reconnaissances by the engineer officers attached to the various headquarters of military divisions and departments, and for the construction and publication of maps for the use of the War Department and the Army, $18,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 1244 and 1245:

For geographical surveys of the Territories west of the one hundreth meridian, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1245:

For continuing experiments in testing iron, steel, and other metals as provided in section 4 of the act approved March 3, 1875, $69,396.98.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines 1256 to 1262 the following words:

The unexpended balances, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the appropriations for like purposes for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1874, 1875, and 1876, respectively, are hereby continued and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

And insert "$56,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other claims of colored soldiers and sailors: For salaries of agents and clerks; rent of office, fuel, lights, stationery, and similar necessaries; office furniture and repairs; transportation of officers and agents; telegraphing and postage, $56,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "Government," in line 1271, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter no person in the employ of the Government of the United States, or of any Department thereof, or of the District of Columbia, shall hold two places of profit, emolument, or salary: And provided also, That no officer, clerk, or employé of Congress shall hold any other office of profit, emolument, or salary while receiving pay from the Senate or House of Representatives, except as authorized by this act.

So as to make the clause read:

For publication of the official records of the rebellion, both of the Union and confederate armies, $40,000; to be paid to persons only who are not otherwise employed by the Government.

Mr. MAXEY. This is an appropriation:

For publication of the official records of the rebellion, both of the Union and confederate armies, $40,000; to be paid to persons only who are not otherwise employed by the Government.

The proviso is to make the latter clause of the text more certain. It goes on to say:

That hereafter no person in the employ of the Government of the United States, or of any Department thereof, or of the District of Columbia, shall hold two places of profit, emolument, or salary: And provided also, That no officer, clerk, or employé of Congress shall hold any other office of profit, emolument, or salary while receiving pay from the Senate or House of Representatives, except as authorized by this act.

That proviso unquestionably makes certain the fact that no one person shall draw two salaries from the Government. I do not see the necessity for striking it out.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee recommended the striking out of the proviso because those provisions of law exist now, and the committee thought it was not worth while to re-enact them again. They are the law now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after the word "history," in line 1287, to insert "and to transfer for duty in connection with the library one additional acting assistant surgeon;" so as to make the clause read:

For completing the Medical and Surgical History of the War the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the act of June 8, 1872, and re-appropriated in the act of June 23, 1874, is hereby continued and rendered available, and the Surgeon-General is hereby authorized to continue on duty in his office the acting assistant surgeons now employed on said history, and to transfer for duty in connection with the library one additional acting assistant surgeon.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know but that the word "transfer" there ought to be "detail."

Mr. WINDOM. Perhaps "detail" is a better word.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "transfer" and inserting "detail."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "expenses," in line 1294, to strike out:

Three hundred and eighteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-three dollars and forty-four cents, in addition to the unexpended balance of former appropriations, which is hereby continued and made available for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877,

And to insert "668,733.44."

So as to make the clause read:

Support of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers: For current expenses, including construction and repairs, namely for Central branch, Eastern branch, Northwestern branch, Southern branch, and for out-door relief and incidental expenses, $668,733.44.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1312, to insert:

For rent of building on southeast corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Fifteenth street northwest, Washington, District of Columbia, from September 1, 1875, to June 30, 1876, at $1,000 per month, $10,000; for rent of the same building from July 1, 1876, to June 30, 1877, at $1,000 per month, $12,000; in all, $22,000.

For repairing and fitting up the so-called Armory building on the Mall between Sixth and Seventh streets, and to enable the Smithsonian Institution to store therein and to take care of specimens of the extensive series of the ores of the precious metals, marbles, building-stones, coals, and numerous objects of natural history now on exhibition in Philadelphia, including other objects of practical and economical value presented by various foreign governments to the National Museum, $4,500.

For the expense of watching and taking proper care of said building and the objects therein contained, $1,500: Provided, That the above sums for the fitting-up and care of the said Armory building be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That it shall hereafter be the duty of all watchmen or policemen employed in the grounds belonging to the United States to co-operate with the Metropolitan police in enforcing the rules and regulations of the board of Metropolitan police made in relation to the public parks and approved by said board.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. On line 1351, page 56, the "T" should be "F." It is a verbal amendment. The name is "F. V. Hayden."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after line 1355 to insert:

For the preparation and publication of maps, charts, and other illustrations necessary for the reports of the survey of the Rocky Mountain region, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the appropriation for the Black Hills survey the following proviso after line 1366:

And it is further provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to audit and settle the accounts of Walter P. Jenney, H. P. Tuttle, and C. G. Newberry, to the amount of $11,000, the same being the sum drawn from the Sioux beneficial fund, in the same manner as if that sum had been appropriated for this survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to offer an amendment to this subdivision. If the Senator from Minnesota wishes the amendments of the committee to be first concluded, I will reserve it until they have been considered.

Mr. WINDOM. I prefer that the Senator would let us go through with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following clause from line 1374 to line 1381:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to purchase, for the use of the United States, the building occupied and owned by the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, together with other real estate adjacent thereto, running about one hundred and sixteen feet on Pennsylvania avenue and about one hundred and thirty-six feet on street No. 15½, being the west half of lot No. 3, all of lots 4, 5, 6, 7, and the south half of lot No. 8, in square No. 221, as laid out and recorded in the original plats or plan of said city, supposed to contain about twenty-three thousand feet, be the same more or less; and, for this object, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and dispose of United States 5 per cent. bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at not less than par in gold, and to use the proceeds in paying for said real estate at a price not exceeding $325,000: Provided, That no payment shall be made of the same until after the Attorney-General shall be satisfied that an indefeasible title to the said real estate will be conveyed to the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill if this is not legislation upon an appropriation bill? It looks that way.

Mr. SARGENT. Not more than buying torpedoes and the like.

Mr. WINDOM. This is in the line of economy, I will say to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. So that you admit that it is legislation in an appropriation bill, very well.

Mr. WINDOM. It is not general legislation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We are renting the upper portion of this building and paying at the present time more than it would cost to have the whole adjacent real estate around. That is to say, we are paying $17,000 per annum for the upper stories of that building, which is fire-proof with the exception of the roof; and by this purchase, which is offered to us by the trustees for the sum named, we obtain it at the interest on a less sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I have a number of amendments to offer, but if agreeable to the Senate I ask that the bill may be reported to the Senate, so that we may act finally upon the amendments already passed upon; and I will reserve my amendments until after that action is taken.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to reserve the amendment in line 1205.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be reserved.

Mr. WINDOM. Concurring in these amendments will not prevent the committee or any one else from offering amendments afterward, I understand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand that the question is on concurring in all the amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In all the amendments, except one which has been reserved.

Mr. WRIGHT. I make the inquiry, as it is my purpose to reserve the amendment found on page 12, line 274. I want some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask also that the amendment on page 39, lines 932 and 933, be reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These three reservations will be made.

Mr. PADDOCK. And also the last amendment, the second section. That being in the nature of a legislative provision, I think the objection of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is well taken. I think we had better consider that matter?

Mr. WEST. How is it legislation?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not desire the Senator from Nebraska to understand that I am objecting to it. With the illustrious examples which have been set for a series of years here, I should scarcely dare to protest against such action in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I assure the Senator that if the other House shall object on the ground that this is legislation, the Senate will not insist that the bill shall be defeated unless they recede from their position.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not objecting. The Senator from Nebraska must have it reserved on his own responsibility and not on mine. I only wanted an open confession, which is good for the soul.

Mr. LOGAN. A confession of what?

Mr. COCKRELL. That this is legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to legislation of a general character on an appropriation bill. This is not legislation of a general character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, in gross, except those reserved.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first reserved amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first reserved amendment, which was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, was in line 1203, after the word "the," to insert "House of Representatives for the," and in line 1205, after the word "between," to strike out the words "the three named gentlemen" and insert "them;" so as to make the clause read:

That the sum of $302.40 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to Henry Cliff, Charles S. Risinger, and Charles E. Diemer, for services rendered as folders for the House of Representatives for the month of February, 1874, to be divided equally between them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to have some explanation why that change from "the three named gentlemen" to "them" is made.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator is not anxious perhaps for an explanation. We do not like to enact titles for anybody in this country, and as the House had given to certain persons the title of "gentlemen" we thought perhaps we had better not enter into that business now.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next reserved amendment is in line 274, after the word "of" to insert "any of;" in line 275, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "not required for its actual current expenses;" and in line 279, after the word "seventy-six," to insert the words "and thereafter;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall reserve of any of the revenues of the District of Columbia not required for its actual current expenses a sum sufficient to meet the interest accruing on the 3.65 bonds of the District during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1876, and thereafter, and apply the same to that purpose; and in case there shall not be a sufficient sum of said revenues in the Treasury of the United States at such time as said interest may be due, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay said interest, and the same shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States from time to time as said revenues may be paid into said Treasury until the full amount shall have been refunded.

Mr. WRIGHT. I reserved this amendment for the purpose of having some explanation of it. I was not in at the time it passed. It strikes me as presenting possibly a very important question. If there be no objection on the part of the Senator from Minnesota having the bill in charge, as the Senate is not full and as I do not suppose he proposes to pass the bill to-night, I suggest that we go on with the other amendments and return to this matter to-morrow.

Mr. SARGENT. We cannot hear what the Senator says.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, in view of the fact that this amendment raises possibly a very important question, if he has no expectation of disposing of the bill to-night, this question might be left open and come up to-morrow.

Mr. SARGENT. Why not pass the bill to-night?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the very question that I have suggested to the Senator from Minnesota. I ask him whether he proposes to dispose of the bill to-night?

Mr. WINDOM. If there be no objection I should be very glad to dispose of it, and I think we ought to do so. I think we can do so in a very few moments.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from Iowa will yield to me, I desire to make a statement in reference to the amendment striking out lines 931 and 932 "to aid in the completion of monument in commemoration of the colored race, $3,000."

I wish to say that the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE,] who is a colored gentleman, desired an opportunity to make an inquiry in reference to this proposed appropriation. He supposed that he would be able to gain knowledge from some members of the House from whom it emanated. He left the Senate to-night with the understanding that the bill would not be concluded, that it would not be passed, that it would not get beyond the Committee of the Whole, or, at all events, beyond being reported from the committee to the Senate. I assured him that there would be an opportunity to-morrow for him to insist upon the rejection of this amendment, so as to restore the clause.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. He says the Senator from Mississippi left the Chamber with the understanding that the bill would not be concluded to-night. With whom did he have such an understanding?

Mr. PADDOCK. He had not an understanding with the entire Senate, of course, but he had that understanding with himself. It was his opinion.

Mr. LOGAN. There are a few Senators who generally are not found here; I do not say the Senator from Mississippi is one of them; but Senators who leave this Chamber have no right to have any understanding about it. It is their business to be here, and I object to any reservation for anybody with any such understanding.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Mississippi left at an early stage of the bill and naturally supposed it would not be passed to a final vote to-night.

Mr. LOGAN. Then he left without knowing whether there would be a quorum here or not. It was his business to be here. I object to any Senator having an amendment reserved on account of his absence.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say that at the time the Senator from Mississippi left the Chamber there was a fair presumption that there would not be a conclusion of this bill to-night.

Mr. LOGAN. There could be no presumption about it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is obvious that the business of the Senate cannot wait the convenience of a single Senator; and I desire to say that in this instance no harm would be done by the Senate disagreeing to the provision of the House. The amendment will go to a committee of conference, and I have no doubt the committee of conference on the part of the Senate would be very glad to confer with the Senator from Mississippi in order to get information, which they sadly lack now, as to whether there is such a monument and all there is about it. There is no occasion for stopping the course of the bill in order to get that information now. We have struck out the clause for the purpose of getting the information, and if we get it we shall be very glad to act upon it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not know that it is of any sort of importance whatever that the amendment should be rejected, but at the same time I think it is no more than fair that the Senator from Mississippi should have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is nothing before the Senate, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reserved by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I was not in at the time this amendment was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole, so that if any explanation was given of it at that time I did not hear it. I should be very glad to have it explained now.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very easily explained. It is to pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds from the revenues of the District.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that perfectly well. I understand that the purport of the amendment as it stands reported by the committee, is that it absolutely fixes and settles beyond all contingency the liability of the Government to pay this interest, and that without any reference to anything connected with the revenue.

Mr. SARGENT. At the time these bonds were authorized to be issued Congress pledged the faith of the Government that the appropriate legislation should be passed to pay the interest on the bonds. The House, in view of that pledge of the faith of the Government of the United States, provided that a sufficient sum to meet the interest should be reserved by the Treasury of the United States from the revenue of the District, and that if it was not sufficient, then the Treasury of the United States should pay the amount, to be refunded to the Treasury out of the revenues as they came into the District treasury. That was all right, and the Senate had no objection to that; but we provided, in the very spirit of the House, an amendment that they should not take the funds absolutely necessary for the current expenses of the District—that is to say, should not shut up the public schools, should not stop the operation of the fire department. The revenues will come in during the year amply sufficient to re-imburse the Government, and it was thought better not to take them as they came in, but that the surplus should be spared rather than to seize the first which came in, which might have the effect of shutting up the public schools, shutting up hospitals, and shutting off the fire department, or something of that kind absolutely necessary for the current expenses.

So, then, we make no change in the spirit of the provision by the Senate amendment, but simply guard against an inconvenience which might be very great in the District. We establish no new principle, and we certainly do not go beyond the legislation which Congress itself provided with regard to these bonds.

Mr. WRIGHT. The inquiry I make is who is to determine what is required for the actual expenses of the District?

Mr. SARGENT. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, because he receives the funds. They are paid into his hands and he is the one who is required to hold on to them or to let them out in his discretion. It is not the commissioners of the District who are to decide it, but our own highest fiscal officer.

Mr. WRIGHT. He determines what is necessary for the current expenses of the District?

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably, because that is a limitation upon his paying out.

Mr. WRIGHT. If that would be sufficient to exhaust the entire sum, then there is nothing left for this purpose?

Mr. SARGENT. If I understand the Senator, I would say that it is in the discretion of the Secretary whether he will hold on to the first money that comes in or money that comes in afterward. During the year he is required to reserve this amount, and it certainly is doing very little toward carrying out the pledge that Congress would provide legislation for the payment of this interest. If the Senator asks me what my individual opinion is, I should say the Government ought to pay one-half the interest absolutely. The bill does not require that, however. It requires the Government to be re-imbursed by the District.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This completes the reserved amendments.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 25, after line 886, I move to insert the following:

> The appropriation of $8,000 made last year to defray the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President under a joint resolution of Congress to represent the United States in an international penitentiary congress is hereby made available, agreeably to the intent of the act making the appropriation for the payment of all necessary expenses incurred in the preliminary labors connected with the preparation for the congress; and further, as the said congress has, for the purpose of a more thorough preparation, been postponed for a year beyond the time originally fixed for holding it, to wit, 1876, therefore the appropriation referred to above is hereby continued in force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, or until the said international penitentiary congress shall have completed its labors.

Mr. BOGY. I hope that will not be adopted. We had that same subject referred to a committee of the Senate and well investigated there. I do not think it ought to be adopted. There is no reason why it should be, and it has no business in this bill surely. It is in a bungling way in this bill at best, and the whole thing is a humbug. These great national conventions about penitentiaries, or prison discipline, and women's rights are all humbugs.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from New Jersey will explain the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The subject was referred to a committee of this body, being the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir; it was there.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And was by them recommended to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOGY. It was passed on in my absence, then.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That may be. It is a subject that was introduced to Congress by a petition from Governor Horatio Seymour. I have that petition here. That was the foundation of this application. I find that last year, 1875, a statute was passed and appropriation made as follows:

> The sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated to pay the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President under a joint resolution approved February 16, 1875, to attend the international congress to be held next year at Rome.

The appropriation was made last year. This amendment does not increase that appropriation. As I understand it, and as it appears by the statement of Governor Seymour, a considerable amount of that money was expended in preparation for that congress; in what way I cannot say. Mr. Fish thought that the strict letter of the statutes only extended to the expenses which would be incurred in attending the congress; and hence the gentlemen who made that expenditure have not been re-imbursed. The object of this amendment is to reimburse them out of that fund, and also to pay the expense of attending the congress which is to be held in 1876–'77. That is set forth in Governor Seymour's petition; and that is all I know about it. It was committed to my hands. I do not think that my friend is right in characterizing it as a humbug. If this was original legislation I do not think that I would advocate it; but as it is in the situation that it is, as these gentlemen have, under the authority of the national Legislature, spent a portion of this money, and have been encouraged to go on with this congress, I think it would be better faith for us to pay the money.

Mr. BOGY. The appropriation is not such as is mentioned by the Senator from New Jersey. It is to pay for the expenses of a commission to attend this convention, and not to pay any past expenses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is for both.

Mr. BOGY. The amendment does not so state.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. O, yes, it does.

Mr. BOGY. This measure was before the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I am a member, and my impression was that we voted against it. Some time when I was not present, no doubt, as my friend well says, the subject must have been reconsidered; but when I was present one day at a meeting of the committee, I may state, and I am maintained by my friend on my left, [Mr. EATON,] we agreed not to recommend this appropriation. I believe now that all such meetings throughout the world going on at the present day are not founded in reason, and that in the end they produce no good. It is but money thrown away to indulge these one-idea men, wild visionaries. As I understand the amendment, it is to pay for expenses to be incurred hereafter, and not past expenses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Both.

Mr. BOGY. Certainly the appropriation heretofore made did not authorize anything of the kind.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is no appropriation at all, I suggest to my friend. The money was appropriated in 1875. This is to utilize that same appropriation.

Mr. BOGY. But my friend cannot state that. I am better informed than that. The appropriation of $8,000 has lapsed, and you have got to make it here. Why do you make it if it is in force? Because it lapses to-day, it expires to-day, and that is the end of it; and unless it is revived in this bill there is no appropriation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur entirely with the Senator from New Jersey as to the propriety of agreeing to the amendment which has been offered. I hope it will be agreed to. I think the Senator from Missouri has spoken with great haste. I think he has said that which on cool reflection he will himself believe to be inappropriate to the occasion in denominating this thing a humbug. Certainly all of us are informed more or less of the improvements that have been made in the construction of prisons all over the world within the last quarter of a century, as to the best modes of their government and the best modes of treating the unfortunate people who are the inmates of these institutions, and of improving their condition and reforming them. Here was a little appropriation made last year for the purpose of inviting the most skilled men in all the world to meet and to confer together as to what were the best modes still to be pursued in the construction of reformatory institutions and in reforming the inmates of them. There was a peculiar condition of things existing which procrastinated the meeting of that congress and threw it over; else that congress would have been held in the past year and the appropriation of last year would have been used. The subject was referred to the committee of which the Senator from Missouri and myself and the Senator from New Jersey are members. It was considered by that committee, never adversely, and I think that it is in the very line of common humanity. I am little less than pained that the Senator from Missouri should have uttered the language which he has uttered here to-night.

Mr. BOGY. I have uttered language in which I think there is nothing improper, if I am a judge of language, and I think I am. I look upon these things as visionary and what we may call humbugs.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator denominated it a humbug. That was the language he used. If the Senator can look upon a scheme like this, embracing so much of humanity and so much of philanthropy, as a humbug, I confess I am surprised.

Mr. BOGY. You are welcome to be surprised; I do look upon it in that light.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not surprised, then, at anything the Senator can say or do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. EATON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SARGENT. That will break up a quorum.

Mr. EATON. There is another thing more important than a quorum in this bill. Let the amendment be withdrawn and the quorum will not be broken.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will hear me one moment, I have some recollection about this matter as an original proposition.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will withdraw this amendment and present it as a bill by itself, very well. I would be glad to meet it in that shape; but I think this amendment ought not to be on this bill. Therefore I insist upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us understand the original proposition, and then perhaps we shall not divide so widely. Governor Seymour and two or three gentlemen came before the Committee on Appropriations a year or two ago when this act was passed, and made the statement that they were desirous of attending this international council and asked an appropriation for that purpose. Whether it was well or ill I do not know; it is hardly worth while to go into that now; but an appropriation was made to enable these gentlemen to attend that congress. It was to be in a particular year. It turned out that it did not take place in that year; but one of these gentlemen went abroad for the purpose of making the preliminary arrangements to attend that congress to make it a success. In harmony with the provisions of this act, at any rate in harmony with the general objects of the act, he spent some two or three thousand dollars of this $8,000, and they desired to spend the balance of it the current year in attendance upon that congress.

The question arose in the State Department on the application of the party who went abroad and made this expenditure to be re-imbursed the expenditure he had made in taking the preliminary steps for the congress, and the Secretary of State put a strict construction upon it and said this $8,000 was really appropriated for the purpose of attending the convention, and this two or three thousand dollars that had been spent in taking the preliminary steps for the convention could not be paid out of it by him. Therefore he remitted the question to Congress for such direction as would enable him to pay those expenses. The case is just this: We did appropriate $8,000 to be expended for that international congress for these gentlemen of high character; they have gone on and made the preliminary steps for that congress of the past year; but it did not take place. They now want such extension of it as will enable the Secretary of State to pay what they have expended in the preliminary steps and also enable them to spend the balance of it in attendance upon that congress next year.

Abont the object itself I take no issue with my honorable friend from Missouri, although I should not perhaps characterize it precisely as he has done. I think these gentlemen were very honest and very sincere, and believed they were performing a very high public duty. Nobody would question the sincerity of the men. It may be that they were misguided, but they did intend, and intend now, that the Government of the United States should be represented in that international congress. We did give our consent, and they have spent, as they believed in harmony with this act, some two or three thousand dollars in making the preliminary steps. They desire to spend the rest according to the objects and general intent of the act. This amendment, therefore, is not to appropriate money, but it is to allow the payment of money in harmony with the general objects of the act, as I understand it.

Mr. BOGY. This only shows that this thing should not be done. The information conveyed to the Senate by the Senator from Maine was not placed before the committee that had charge of this particular subject. It is all new, new matter, new facts, new information. I think there can be no doubt that if one of these commissioners went to Europe in pursuance of the appropriation and as a commissioner, his expenses ought to have been paid by the Secretary of State; and if he was not paid, it was because he did not go there when he ought to have gone. There being no convention in session for this visionary thing, he ought not to have gone. It is said that he went there as a preliminary matter. I cannot understand the meaning of that word in that sense. Did he go there to qualify himself for commissioner? What could there be preliminary to a convention in relation to prison discipline in Europe? If he did go there as commissioner, he was entitled to pay; and if he did not get it it was because he did not comply with the law.

This a new appropriation, entirely new, and I am opposed to it. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of course, I do not dispute what the gentleman from New Jersey states, but at the meeting where I was we did not agree to report it back. I have no disposition to question, nor do I question, his statement at all, but my understanding at that time was that the Committee on Foreign Relations were opposed to it, and I am opposed to it now because I believe no good results from these hasty gatherings. Trade conventions and all matters of that kind really amount to nothing and do no good. A man can write a book on prison discipline and pour out thoughts acquired by study very well; but to have a parcel of gentlemen meet who want to talk and ventilate themselves in Europe or elsewhere, amounts to nothing at all, and it is what I call a humbug. I hope I am not offensive to my friend from Maine, but it is nothing else but a humbug.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator doubts whether this measure passed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the Senator does not misunderstand me. I said when I was present. Of course the Senator said it passed and I do not question the statement, but I spoke of when I was present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not know whether it had passed or not; so the day before yesterday I requested the clerk of the committee to call on each member of the committee and get his views. He returned me this written statement:

The Committee on Foreign Relations vote on the proposed extension of the appropriation of $8,000 for the international penitentiary congress as follows:
YEA—Mr. Conkling, Mr. Hamlin, Mr. Cameron, and Mr. Frelinghuysen.
NAY—Mr. McCreery, Mr. Bogy, and Mr. Eaton.

I presume that that statement is correct, and I certainly am verified.

Mr. BOGY. Is there a majority in favor of it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is a majority in favor of it.

Mr. BOGY. There is an equal division there now, it seems to me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, sir; there are four in favor of it and three against it. I did not know how it stood before the committee, and therefore prior to reporting it as from the committee I required the clerk to canvass the committee in this way.

Mr. BOGY. I wish the gentleman to understand me. As a question of fact I do not at all question what he says. There is no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is what the clerk has stated. I have no doubt it is correct. It seems to me what money has been expended these gentlemen ought to be repaid, and I think that inasmuch as Congress has given its indorsement to this conference heretofore, and this commissioner has been appointed, and the conference is to take place, and the public generally think it will accomplish great good, we ought just to continue the appropriation made last year. At any rate let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. BOGY. The yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put; and there were on a division ayes 21.

Mr. SARGENT. I must appeal to the friends of this amendment to withdraw it. We can pass the bill to-night provided this is not in the way. If the yeas and nays are insisted upon, of course the bill goes over. We ought not to delay this bill because some gentlemen desire this provision to pass.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly shall not withdraw it while the world stands.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. Then I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Randolph, Robertson, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Key, McCreery, Sargent, Wadleigh, and Withers—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—38.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

APPROVAL OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, and to ask that it be passed.

The bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that for a period not exceeding ten days from and after the 30th day of June, 1876, unless the regular appropriations for such Departments shall have been previously made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1877, it shall be lawful for any of the Departments of the Government for which appropriations for the said fiscal year are delayed to use for the necessary service of such Departments any unexpended balance which may exist of the appropriations made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. It will be remembered that the President's message recommended, without limit as to time in case of the appropriation bills failing at the end of the fiscal year to have been adopted by both Houses, that the balances should be expended. It will be recollected also that yesterday the Senate originated a joint resolution providing for somewhat similar action for a period of thirty days. The Committee on Appropriations are of opinion that such legislation in the first place should originate here and, secondly, that ten days will be adequate to bring about an agreement between the two Houses on the various appropriation bills unpassed.

There are four appropriation bills that have passed both Houses, there are six in committees of conference, and two remain unacted upon by the Senate. The sundry civil bill was reported to the Senate on yesterday. The river and harbor bill has not been reported at all to the Senate from the Senate committee.

Last night the committee of conference on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill failed to agree, and will report the fact this morning first to the Senate, and in all probability will report the proposition from the House conferees made to the Senate conferees, and obtain the opinion of the Senate as to that proposition. In due time, if it should come from the Senate, I will take occasion to speak as to that proposition.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for a moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two House thereon, and had appointed Mr. WEST, Mr. HAMLIN, and Mr. MAXEY as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say in regard to the bill which is the subject of the message just received from the Senate that the balance to the credit of the Post-Office Department is understood to exceed a million of dollars, and that, if the bill just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations shall pass both branches of Congress, so far as that Department is concerned, it will not be in the slightest degree embarrassed by the failure to pass the post-office appropriation bill prior to the expiration of the present fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman is he certain there is a million of dollars of unexpended balance to the credit of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think I can say with entire certainty that the balance to the credit of the Post-Office Department considerably exceeds a million of dollars.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] tell us whether there are unexpended balances to the credit of all the Departments?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee considered that question, and understand that the President, before he sent the message to Congress, had consulted the Attorney-General and had made other investigations so far as to know that his recommendation in regard to making temporary provision for the expenditures of the Government would relieve the Government from any embarrassment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] could add that the joint resolution which came to the House yesterday from the Senate was a joint resolution simply re-appropriating the amounts remaining to the credit of the various Departments of the Government under the appropriations for the present fiscal year, so that in fact the bill now before the House contains substantially the same provisions that are contained in the joint resolution that came from the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Was not the recommendation of the President to continue the present appropriations, instead of giving leave to use the unexpended balances?

Mr. RANDALL. That is about the same thing.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was not for new appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understood the message of the President, it was for permission to use the unexpended balances.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My recollection is that it was a recommendation to continue the present appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then the question comes up, are there unexpended balances to the credit of each Department, to which the bill now before the House will apply?

Mr. RANDALL. We understand that this legislation will remove any embarrassment.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to ask the gentleman if, in recommending this proposed legislation this morning, it is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to back down from its position?

Mr. RANDALL. Far from it; to my mind it is in just the opposite direction. While we do not wish to embarrass the Government, for one, so far as I am concerned, I propose in my official position here as a member of the House to resist to the every utmost unnecessary appropriation or extravagant expenditure.

Mr. LUTTRELL. You mean to stand by reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is right; retrenchment and reform.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent to make at this time sundry reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with favorable recommendations, the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

LIEUTENANT CHARLES B. SMITH.

Mr. KETCHAM also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3819) to settle the accounts of Lieutenant Charles B. Smith, late of the Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARTHA J. COSTON.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 728, for the relief of Martha J. Coston.

The bill appropriates $13,000 to Martha J. Coston, in full of all claims and demands upon the Government of the United States for the use of the Coston signal-light.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before raising any question as to the propriety of considering this bill at this time and reserving all objections, I would be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] will have the report of the committee read.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I have here the report of the Senate committee on this bill, and I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read the following report of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate:

This claim was considered by the House Committee on Naval Affairs the last Congress, and a bill reported for relief of petitioner, accompanied by report No. 334, which is referred to as embracing a statement of the facts in the case before us.

Mrs. Coston is the widow of Benjamin F. Coston, the inventor of the telegraphic night-signals, which bear his name, an invention and system perfected by her since her husband's death, and which was adopted and has been used by our naval and life-saving service for many years.

In 1859 these signals were tested, and at the commencement of the war the Department made a proposition to the petitioner to sell to the Government the right to manufacture these signals for the use of the Navy, and an appropriation for the purpose was passed, which she accepted. The officers of the Government found it difficult (if not impossible) to manufacture them to advantage, and the Secretary of the Navy requested Mrs. Coston to undertake their manufacture for the Navy; and the price per set of twelve pieces was agreed upon at $4.50. This was in the spring of 1861; the signals were delivered, and the price named was paid. The petitioner urged at that time, and now claims, that by reason of the increased cost of labor and materials she was entitled to, and should have received, an advance over and above the price stipulated. To this complaint, however, the Department would not listen, as the price had been fixed by agreement; and it is believed by the committee that she continued in the business of supplying these signals to the Government almost, if not quite, without profit.

By law it was provided that on contracts made previous to its passage the taxes and duties subsequently imposed should be paid by the purchaser, and when the petitioner endeavored to obtain the amount of taxes from the Navy Department she was met with the suggestion that no written agreement could be found contracting with her at the price named, therefore the law was not applicable to her case. Near the close of the war the Department increased the price of her signals to $6 per set, thus acknowledging the justice of her demand, but there were very few delivered after this period, and the increase did not cover those already furnished. Subsequent to the time of entering into the agreement referred to taxes on manufacturer's sales were imposed and had to be paid by the petitioner; additional duties were also levied on some of the articles entering into these signals, the prices for labor almost doubled, and the chemicals used increased in cost from 50 to 75 per cent., and the certificates given her in payment were sold at a discount.

The following letter from Rear-Admiral Smith is made a part of this report:

WASHINGTON, July 1, 1865.

SIR: In regard to the reference from you to me of MRS. M. J. Coston's letter to you of June 28 last, touching compensation to her for the Coston signals, I beg leave to say that the arrangement for employing those signals was made in the Bureau of Detail in the spring of 1861, then in charge of Commodore Paulding; the price was agreed upon, as well as I remember, at $4.50 per set of twelve pieces. The signals were furnished as required, and paid for at that price.

The war greatly increased the cost of the materials, and consequently Mrs. Coston petitioned for an increase of price on that before the war agreed upon. This was not granted, on the plea that the price had been fixed. The delivery, receipt, and payment for the signals is ample evidence of that fact.

By the act of June 30, 1864, section 97, persons who shall have made any contract prior to the passage of said act are authorized to add to the prices thereof so much money as will be equivalent to the duty so subsequently imposed. Now, Mrs. Coston claims that the price of the signals was fixed before the passage of the act referred to, and that she has a just claim upon the Government for the amount of the tax.

The claim of Mrs. Coston for an increase of price on the signals, after the contingencies of the war had greatly increased the cost of the materials, was just and fair, in my opinion; as that request was denied by the Ordnance Department, she is certainly entitled to the tax on the bills rendered.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. SMITH.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

The petitioner paid taxes, as per statement, $13,000, and if allowed interest, would make her claim amount to some over $21,000.

The committee, after careful examination of the papers before them, have arrived at the same conclusion as the House committee of the Forty-third Congress, and recommend that Mrs. Coston be paid the sum of $15,000, in full satisfaction of her claim against the Government, and report the accompanying bill and ask its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Mr. BANKS. The Committee on the Centennial Celebration, to whom was referred an invitation to the Speaker and members of the House to attend a celebration in this city of the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, have directed me to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Centennial Celebration, to whom was referred a communication from John B. Blake, esq., president of the Society of the Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia, inviting the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives to attend their celebration of the centennial anniversary of American Independence in the city of Washington, respectfully report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a committee of thirteen members to attend on the part of the House the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American Independence in the city of Washington by the Society of the Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia.

The resolution reported by the committee was adopted.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL. The object of this joint resolution is to make the 3d day of July of this centennial year, 1876, a national holiday, so that those in positions in the Departments at Washington and in Government offices elsewhere through the country may without loss of pay for that day go to Philadelphia, if they so desire, to join in the centennial celebration, which commences the evening of the 3d. The 4th day of July is a national holiday by existing law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is objection insisted upon?

Mr. HURLBUT. It is; we are going to stay here ourselves.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think not.

PICKRELL & BROOCKS.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3827) for the relief of Pickrell and Broocks, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BUSHBY.

Mr. CABELL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 740) for the relief of William Bushby; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EASTERN BAND CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to collect and receive in payment of the amount due on certain judgments in favor of William Johnston and against William H. Thomas, now held by him in trust for the eastern band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, the lands mentioned and described in the award of Rufus Barringer, John H. Dillard, and Thomas Ruffin, as a board of arbitrators, under date of October 23, 1874, upon which such judgments were a lien; such lands to be taken at their cash value, to be determined by an appraisal to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and conveyed to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians in fee-simple; provided that if the lands above mentioned shall not be sufficient in value to pay off and discharge said judgment, the Commissioner is authorized to receive such other lands as the said eastern band of Indians may select, by and with the assent of the said Commissioner, to an amount sufficient to discharge the said judgment.

Mr. SCALES. I do not think there can be any objection to the passage of that bill.

Mr. RAINEY. I have a word to say on that bill.

Mr. SCALES. It provides for the payment of certain judgments heretofore recovered on behalf of the North Carolina Cherokees against one William H. Thomas. He is almost insolvent except as to lands. The Indian council have agreed they will take the lands at a valuation to be appraised by persons appointed by themselves. It is already agreed upon between them, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs approves of it, and drew up a bill and sent it here to accomplish the purpose. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. RANDALL. No bill of that kind should pass the House without a fuller explanation than we have had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not object to the bill and it is now too late.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is still subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the bill appropriate any money?

Mr. SCALES. It does not appropriate a cent out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does indirectly.

Mr. RAINEY. It is to get rid of some worthless lands, giving them in satisfaction of judgments held by these Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not exactly apprised as to the facts. The gentleman from North Carolina says the bill does not appropriate the public lands of the United States or money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not insist on the point of order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. BOONE. I rise to a privileged question. I ask that the subpœna and return to it, as well as a telegram which I send up, be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America.

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq., Sergeant-at-Arms, or his special messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon Colonel W. F Shaffer to be and appear before the Expenditures in Interior Department Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which Hon. WILLIAM MUTCHLER is chairman, in their chamber in the city of Washington, forthwith, then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States at the City of Washington, this 1st day of June, 1876.

[SEAL.] M. C. KERR, Speaker.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk.

RETURN.

Subpœna for William F. Shaffer before the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. Served June 12, 9.30 p. m., personally, by reading and by leaving copy.

JNO. G. THOMPSON,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.
DONAVIN.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 1.

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Sergeant-at-Arms, Washington City:

Subpœnaed Colonel William F. Shaffer at nine and a half o'clock p. m. He says he will proceed immediately to Washington when the convention is over.

S. K. DONAVIN.

Mr. BOONE. I desire to state that Colonel Shaffer is in default, not having made his appearance before the committee. I therefore send to the Clerk's desk a resolution for the adoption of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas William F. Shaffer was, on the 10th day of June, instant, duly summoned to appear and testify before a standing committee of this House on the expenditures in the Interior Department, and has without sufficient cause neglected to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of the said William F. Shaffer wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith brought before the bar of the House, to answer for contempt of the authority of the House in thus failing to appear before said committee.

Mr. BOONE. I desire to state that there is a matter before the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department which is a matter of importance, and the evidence of Mr. Shaffer in relation thereto we deem material and important. The committee are of opinion that he does not desire to appear. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW MADRID LOCATIONS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to have put upon its passage at this time the bill (H. R. No. 100) granting legal titles to all New Madrid locations in the State of Missouri for which patents have not heretofore been issued.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the question of consideration on this bill until the gentleman from Missouri has made his statement in explanation of it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hold in my hand a favorable report on this bill by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the bill is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BUCKNER. I shall ask to have the Committee of the Whole discharged from its further consideration.

The object of this bill is merely to convey the legal title to these lands to the parties who have an equitable title to them. This is necessary in consequence of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that the statute of limitations in any State does not begin to run in favor of a party claiming under a title unless he has a patented title. That is the object of the bill. It does not convey a foot of land. The Government has conveyed the title long ago, and the object of the bill is to give the legal title to these New Madrid holders. As the law now is, under the decision of the Supreme Court a party may be in possession fifty years under one of these New Madrid location titles and yet cannot avail himself of the statute of limitations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state why the patent does not issue?

Mr. BUCKNER. That may be explained in this way: The certificates issued under the act of Congress are regarded as good, legal titles, and hence these parties make no effort to get patents. Relying upon the decisions of our courts, they regard them as legal titles; and patents are never issued except on the application of the parties interested. The whole object of this bill is merely in the interest of peace, to stop litigation. There is nothing else in it, and I hope gentlemen will make no objection to it.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill may be reported again.

Mr. HOLMAN. What extent of land is affected by this bill?

Objection was made to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

GEORGE GROVE.

Mr. RAINEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3461) granting a pension to George Grove; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SALE OF DESERT LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LANE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 125) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Modoc and Siskiyou Counties, in California, and to ask unanimous consent that the bill, as amended, may be put upon its passage.

Mr. PIPER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LANE. I withdraw it.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the following bill and petitions; and the same were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. No. 3699) to increase the pension of Mrs. Louisa Kearney, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel James Kearney, corps of Topographical Engineers, United States Army;

The petition of Martha Somerville, of Davidson County, Tennessee; and

The petition of Anna Brasil, widow of David Brasil, sergeant in the revolutionary war.

JAMES O. ROBERTSON.

Mr. SEELYE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3210) for the relief of James O. Robertson, esq.; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

F. PROSH AND T. F. M'ELROY.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back House bill No. 3617, for the relief of F. Prosh and T. F. McElroy, of Washington Territory; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

MARION WILLSAPS.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3828) for the relief of Marion Willsaps; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN POWERS.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, House bill No. 3332, for the relief of Stephen Powers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. McCRARY. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 435, to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners, and to ask that the bill be now considered and passed.

The bill provides that section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 5546. All persons who have been, or who may hereafter be, convicted of crime by any court of the United States, whose punishment is imprisonment in a district or Territory where, at the time of conviction, or at any time during the term of imprisonment, there may be no penitentiary or jail suitable for the confinement of convicts or available therefor, shall be confined during the term for which they have been or may be sentenced, or during the residue of said term, in some suitable jail or penitentiary in a convenient State or Territory, to be designated by the Attorney-General, and shall be transported and delivered to the warden or keeper of such jail or penitentiary by the marshal of the district or Territory where the conviction has occurred; and, if the conviction be had in the District of Columbia, the transportation and delivery shall be by the warden of the jail of that District; the reasonable actual expense of transportation, necessary subsistence, and hire and transportation of guards and the marshal, or the warden of the jail in the District of Columbia only to be paid by the Attorney-General out of the judiciary fund. But if, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, the expense of transportation from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, in which there is no penitentiary, will exceed the cost of maintaining them in jail in the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, during the period of their sentence, then it shall be lawful so to confine them therein for the period designated in their respective sentences. And such change may be ordered in any case when, in the opinion of the Attorney-General it is necessary for the preservation of the health of the prisoner, or when, in his opinion, the place of confinement is not sufficient to secure the custody of the prisoner, or because of cruel or improper treatment: Provided, however, That no change shall be made in the case of any prisoner on the ground of the unhealthiness of the prison, of because of his treatment, after his conviction and during his term of imprisonment, unless such change shall be applied for by such prisoner, or some one in his behalf.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out the words "such change" before the words "may be ordered in any case," and to insert in lieu the words "the place of imprisonment;" also in the same line to strike out the word "ordered" and to insert the word "changed;" so that it will read: "and the place of imprisonment may be changed in any case when, in the opinion of the Attorney-General," &c.

Mr. LORD. Is it in order to pass bills now against the unfinished business of yesterday, which has precedence this morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCRARY. This bill has been read, and it will take but a moment more to pass it.

Mr. LORD. I desire to give notice that I shall object to any other bill or any other business except bills for reference.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GOODIN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GOODIN. What is the regular order for this hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business at the adjournment of yesterday's session: the Geneva award bill.

Mr. GOODIN. To-day being Friday, does not the consideration of the Private Calendar take precedence?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the order made for the consideration of the Geneva award bill no exception was made in regard to private-bill day; it is a continuing order, for Friday as well as for any other day.

Mr. LORD. I desire to state that after the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] shall have concluded his remarks (he being compelled to leave the Hall this morning) I will not antagonize a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CLERK OF REAL-ESTATE-POOL COMMITTEE.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Investigation of the Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s Indebtedness be, and they are hereby, allowed to retain the services of a clerk from the day of last appointment to the 15th day of July, 1876.

Mr. POWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee of Accounts, also reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and he is hereby, allowed $5 per day from the 1st day of April, 1876, instead of $4 per day, as heretofore allowed.

Mr. POWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2685) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any limit fixed to the discussion of this Geneva award bill? It seems to be engrossing the whole time of the House to the exclusion of all other business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MILLS. I ask whether debate on this bill is unlimited?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no limitation except such as may be fixed by the action of the House.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move that all debate on this subject be closed after to-day, if that is a proper motion.

Mr. LORD. I have not yielded the floor for any such purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to have some limit fixed to the debate. I would like to have the question put on my motion.

Mr. FRYE. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yield for the motion of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; there are several other gentlemen who want to speak.

Mr. MILLS. I do not propose to stop debate now, but after to-day.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD,] who has charge of this bill, proposes as soon as I get through to yield, that the House may go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. My reason for going on now is that I am obliged to leave, owing to the condition of my health.

Mr. MILLS. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman's speech, or any other speech that may be made to-day; but I desire that we may have some time to attend to other business.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the conclusions at which your committee have arrived can be sustained no more forcibly than by a brief recital of the causes of complaint of our Government against Great Britain, the attendant circumstances, the negotiations, the treaties proposed, the proceedings before the tribunal agreed upon, the award, and the action of Congress relating to its distribution.

Our country was in the midst of a terrible civil war, section arrayed against section, the Republic struggling for life, and that life in imminent danger; then, when the confederacy had no navy, not a single ship of war, no harbor of refuge, no ports open, no ship-yards, no docks, no prize courts, nothing appertaining to a naval power whatsoever, came the terrible news that Great Britain had recognized their belligerent rights—a recognition unexpected, unauthorized, unjust, and wicked, made for the purpose of humiliating if not destroying us. Says Reverdy Johnson in his dispatch to Mr. Seward:

> The history of the world furnishes no instance of so speedy a recognition in the case of revolutionary efforts to subvert an existing government. At the time it was made the insurgents had no port within which to build a ship of war large or small, or the power to get her out if she was built. Nor had they any port to which they could carry any ship that they might capture as prize of war for condemnation in a court of admiralty.

The proclamation granting these rights was issued just before our minister, Mr. Adams, had been received by the British government. At his first interview he said:

> I must be permitted to express the great regret I had felt on learning the decision to issue the Queen's proclamation, which at once raised the insurgents to the level of a belligerent state. * * * It pronounced the insurgents to be a belligerent state before they had ever shown their capacity to maintain any kind of warfare whatever. * * * It considered them a maritime power before they had ever exhibited a single privateer on the ocean.—Correspondence concerning claims against Great Britain, volume 1, pages 183, 184.

Soon after it was known in Washington, our Government wrote to Mr. Adams: "The whole American people, so far as they are American, are shocked, offended, and disgusted with declarations of neutrality by the British government."—Ibid., page 202.

What was the result? In June, 1861, the Sumter escaped from the Mississippi, and destroyed the ship Golden Rocket the 3d of July. She was insured. The underwriters refused to pay, and the courts sustained the refusal. In October following the Nashville escaped. At this time our ships were in every sea, in all the ports of the world, freighted with the productions of every country, bearing the fortunes of thousands of our citizens. The intense alarm of our merchants and ship-owners can at this late day hardly be realized. The hawk hovers over the chickens, and the hen gathers them under her wing. Whither could our scattered ships flee for protection? The wing of the Government was powerless to cover them. But how fared these cruisers? They were at once welcomed in every British port; their officers fêted, their sailors made heroes of, their achievements glorified. Such encouragement bore its legitimate fruit. A few more vessels escaped from confederate ports—the Boston, Jeff. Davis, Sallie, and Retribution—doing, however, but little damage. English ship-yards became busy, and the Florida, the Alabama, the Georgia, the Tallahassee, the Chickamauga, and the Shenandoah, built in those yards, equipped, provisioned, and manned in English ports, were soon preying upon American commerce. Several of these cruisers were never in a confederate port during the war. The destruction of our shipping was immediate and the effect upon our commerce terrible. For years we had been increasing our ocean tonnage immensely—from 1830 to 1840, 60 per cent.; from 1840 to 1850, 75 per cent.; from 1850 to 1860, 60 per cent., and in 1861 had reached our highest point, having afloat 2,700,000 tons, and occupying the second place among the nations of the earth in the extent of ocean tonnage. A few years more of such advance would have given us the proud position of mistress of the seas. Perhaps England saw this, feared it, and those cruisers were only doing her will. From 1861 to 1866 more than a million tons of this shipping was lost to us; more than one hundred thousand were burned by English cruisers, sailing under the confederate flag, and more than nine hundred thousand sought protection under foreign flags, principally under that of England. The value of that remaining was crippled by the perils from cruisers, the risk of sailing under our flag being so great as to drive a large proportion of the carrying trade into foreign bottoms. Our prestige was gone, our commercial power broken, and England was without a rival. Who can estimate the gain to her, acquired by her wrong to us?

As might well be supposed, all the loyal people of our country were deeply, profoundly indignant, incensed at England's course. They saw their commercial power broken; their citizens, entitled to protection, deprived of it; their war prolonged; thousands of precious lives lost on both sides; an immense debt incurred, to be an enduring burden to them and to their children, all largely the result of this reckless, unfriendly, and wicked recognition of belligerent rights. There was a deep-seated and universal determination that Great Britain should be compelled to answer for what we charged upon her as her crime; and when the war was over, with our immense Navy, our Army composed of hundreds of thousands of veteran soldiers, our whole people inspired with this intense feeling of unrequited wrong, war with England was indeed imminent. But our leading military officers and our statesmen counseled peace. A war between two such nations would be a fearful calamity, destructive not only to them, but to the interests of the civilized world. Negotiations were commenced, the Clarendon-Johnson treaty was proposed, and so earnestly and ably opposed by Hon. Mr. Sumner that the United States Senate rejected it. What was the opposition to it? That it failed to provide for reparation to our citizens? By no means. In this it was ample, certain, and complete. Reverdy Johnson said of it:

> This question (the alleged unauthorized recognition of belligerent rights,) as well as the question whether this (the English) government had observed their neutral obligations in suffering the Alabama and other vessels to be built and escape from their ports, will be both before the commission and the umpire. That their decision will be in favor of the United States I do not doubt. The reasons for this conviction I will briefly state: First, the recognition of belligerent rights.
> Upon this ground, then, independent of the question of proper diligence, the obligation of Great Britain to meet the losses seems to me to be most apparent. * * * I am satisfied that if the convention goes into operation every dollar due on what are known as the Alabama claims will be recovered.—Johnson to Seward, Message and Documents, Department of State, part 1, 1868 and 1869, page 411.

We could trace all our commercial disasters, all the losses and damages to our citizens on the seas, directly to this precipitate recognition of belligerency. Our Government maintained this view, and said, October 5, 1863:

"The successive preparations of hostile naval expeditions in Great Britain are regarded here as fruits of that injudicious proclamation." (Page 270.) And January 6, 1864: "On our part we trace all the evils to an unnecessary and, as we think, an anomalous recognition by Her Majesty's government." * * * (Page 273.)

In a formal note to the British government dated May 20, 1865, our Government maintained:

First. That the act of recognition * * * was precipitate and unprecedented.

Second. That it had the effect of creating these parties belligerents after the recognition, instead of merely acknowledging an existing fact. * * *

Fourth. That during the whole course of the struggle in America, of nearly four years in duration, there has been no appearance of the insurgents as a belligerent on the ocean excepting in the shape of British vessels, constructed, equipped, supplied, manned, and armed in British ports. * * *

Seventh. That the failure to check this flagrant abuse of neutrality, * * * with the aid of the recognition of their belligerent character has resulted in the burning and destroying on the ocean a large number of merchant vessels and a very large amount of property belonging to the people of the United States.

* * * * * * *

Ninth. That the injuries thus received are of so grave a nature as in reason and justice to constitute a valid claim for reparation and indemnification.

* * * * * * *

Again, January 23 and February 5, 1862: "We are embarrassed by the attitude of the British government in regard to the entertainment it gives in its ports to pirates engaged * * * in destroying our national commerce. * * * It is easy to see that this is the effect of a premature recognition of the insurrection as entitled to belligerent rights."—(Page 223.) And February 27: "For our own part, we must remain in the belief that the cause and the only cause of all the misapprehensions and embarrassments which have occurred, affecting the two countries, was an unnecessary and premature concession of belligerent rights to the insurgents."—(Page 226.)

Johnson, Seward, Adams, Sumner, in fact all of our eminent public men, held to this doctrine, and all agreed in the assertion that the Clarendon-Johnson treaty admitted this premature recognition of belligerency as the basis of our claims, and that under it our citizens suffering damage from inculpated and exculpated cruisers, by destruction of their vessels, their cargoes, payment of war premiums or otherwise, would be fully indemnified. Then to right the wrongs of citizens nothing more was required. But Mr. Sumner insisted that while it did amply secure the citizen it failed entirely in repairing the national wrongs. It opened no door for any claim for prolonging the war, for money expended in the pursuit of cruisers, for driving our commerce from the seas, for damages to the nation of infinitely greater importance than the destruction of private property by confederate cruisers. For such reasons the Senate refused to ratify this treaty, and the ample remedies it afforded for our citizens were lost, but the reasons for the rejection impressed our people and they acquiesced. We gave no release; our purpose continued firm and unalterable to demand and to receive from Great Britain redress. The President, in December, 1870, calls the attention of Congress to the matter, in his message, as follows:

I regret to say that no conclusion has been reached for the adjustment of the claims against Great Britain, growing out of the course adopted by that government during the rebellion. The cabinet of London, so far as its views have been expressed, does not appear to be willing to concede that Her Majesty's government was guilty of any negligence, or did or permitted any act during the war by which the United States has just cause of complaint. Our firm and unalterable convictions are directly the reverse. I therefore recommend to Congress to authorize the appointment of a commission to take proof of the amount and ownership of these several claims on notice to the representatives of Her Majesty at Washington, and that authority be given for the settlement of these claims by the United States, so that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims, as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain.

It cannot be necessary to add that, whenever Her Majesty's government shall entertain a desire for a full and friendly adjustment of these claims, the United States will enter upon their consideration with an earnest desire for a conclusion consistent with the honor and dignity of both nations.

This aroused Great Britain and negotiations were commenced in 1871, which resulted in the treaty of Washington. Arbitrators were mutually agreed upon. The United States appeared as plaintiff, England as defendant. What did the counsel for the plaintiff claim before this august tribunal?

1. Claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.

2. The national expenditures in pursuit of those cruisers.

3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.

4. The enhanced payment of insurance.

5. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to its cost, &c.

Were the whole of these claims seriously maintained? Undoubtedly, and had been from the beginning. The proofs of this are conclusive. When this case became known in England the whole nation seemed to have been suddenly stricken by madness. The statesmen, the press, and the people clamored, raved, denounced, and denied. Time wore away. The final hearing was approaching, and once more an earnest effort was made to reconcile the differences. An additional stipulation was proposed to the Senate, as follows:

Whereas both governments adopt for the future the principle that claims for remote or indirect losses should not be admitted as the result of failure to observe neutral obligations, so far as to declare that it will hereafter guide the conduct of both governments in their relations with each other: Now, therefore, in consideration thereof, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, consents that he will make no claim, on the part of the United States, in respect of indirect losses, as aforesaid, before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva.

Congress adjourned before any conclusion was arrived at. In the mean time these rules had been agreed upon, adopted by both nations for the government of the arbitrators:

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

The 15th of June was fast approaching, when our Government must present final argument or lose their hold on the treaty. An adjournment was proposed, was had, from the 15th to the 19th of June; consultations were held, dispatches sent and received, until the tribunal announced that, after careful consideration, in their opinion the claims of the United States for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payment of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war, &c., must be excluded. Then the case proceeded at once to final hearing. I wish to call your attention to certain dispatches and communications calculated to throw light upon this finding.

April 2, 1872, the Secretary of State wrote to General Schenck:

Neither the Government of the United States, nor, so far as I can hear, any considerable number of the American people, have ever attached much importance to the indirect claims, or have ever expected or desired any award of damages on their account. * * * In the correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating that we neither desired nor expected any pecuniary award, and that we should be content with an award that a state is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations. It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States, with their large extent of sea-coast, a small Navy, and a small internal police, to have it established that a nation is liable in damages for the indirect, remote, or consequential results of a failure to observe its neutral duties.—The correspondence respecting the Geneva Arbitration, page 63.

It is not for their interest to exaggerate the responsibilities of neutrals, but only in the sense of their action in this respect throughout their whole national life-time to restrain the field of arms and enlarge that of peace.—Argument of Counsel at Geneva. Papers, &c., volume 3, page 223.

* * * It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States, with their large extent of sea-coast, a small Navy, and a smaller internal police, to have it established that a nation is liable in damages, &c. * * * This Government expects to be in the future, as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent.

The United States have had occasion to look practically on both sides of the question, and therefore sometimes to assert neutral duties, while more generally asserting neutral rights and the policy of peace, to such extent and under such circumstances as to have rendered the United States the champion of neutral rights. * * *

Again Mr. Schenck says:

I think the principle declared in this article for future observance between the two nations is one which, if settled and maintained, must be of inestimable advantage to the United States. With our chances of being generally neutral, when Great Britain and the other European states are belligerent, the benefits of the rule are to be principally and oftenest ours. Our continental position, our extended sea-coast, our numerous ports, the enterprising character of our citizens, and the difficulty of restraining their spirit of adventure, surely make the rule that would thus be established more valuable and more favorable to the United States than to perhaps any other country.

Immediately the opinion of the tribunal was assented to—

[Telegram No. 114, Mr. Fish to General Schenck and Mr. Davis.]

* * * The President directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal, as its judgment upon a question of public law, which he felt that the interests of both governments required should be decided. * * * This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary reward, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character.

Letter of Hon. E. R. Hoar, one of the commissioners.

America's statesmen, in charge of her case, were neither narrow-minded nor short-sighted. They realized that this was the golden opportunity to gain advantage not only for our nation, but for all nations, advantage compared with which any amount of mere money indemnity would be insignificant. Our policy, so wisely inaugurated by Washington, had always been to avoid complications with foreign powers, and to be strictly neutral in foreign wars. Hence we had been the champion of the rights of neutrals, which England had habitually infringed upon or disregarded. As expressed by our counsel at Geneva, both the sentiments and the interests of the United States, their history and their future, have made and will make them the principal advocates and defenders of the rights of neutrals, before all the world. * * * The world needed, and it was especially the interest of the United States, to have not only the privileges but the obligations of neutrals well-defined and established. They therefore wisely insisted that the tribunal should give its judgment on these claims.

They placed the facts and the claims before the tribunal, hoping that they would be regarded "as a reason why a gross sum should be awarded which should be an ample and liberal compensation for our losses by captures and burnings, without going into petty details." * * * They were aware, too, that the injuries which England had inflicted on the United States were such as money could not pay for, and though "regretted" by England in the treaty, would never be forgotten by Americans. * * * They knew that what Richard Cobden had said during the debate in the English Parliament in regard to the Georgia was true, that we "have a sea-coast on the Atlantic and another on the Pacific; that however vigilant, loyal, and true to its principles the American Government might be when England should be at war, if American nature be human nature, that out of their numerous and almost inaccessible creeks and corners there will be persons to send forth fleet steamers to prey upon her commerce; that many Americans will think it an act of actual patriotism to do so." * * * They therefore offered to accept a new rule: "That both governments adopt for the future the principle that claims for remote or indirect losses should not be admitted as the result of failure to observe neutral obligations, * * * as the consideration for, and as a final settlement of, the three classes of the indirect claims put forth in the case of the United States."—Short History of Long Negotiations.

From these citations from the history of the transaction the conclusion is inevitable that both countries assented in advance to this finding of the arbitrators, thus saving the treaty and solemnly settling certain great principles of international law.

It is further evident that our country was pre-eminently satisfied with what had been accomplished up to this time. The premature recognition of belligerent rights had been waived by us, and thus we had been saved from being placed under guardianship for all the future. The three rules had been established, and we should have the benefit of them forever.

Indirect claims had been solemnly adjudicated against, and in all wars to come between other nations, we, being neutral, should reap the advantage. The gain to us in all this was immense, hardly to be calculated in money. What we had lost, or what we had paid for these advantages, I will come to by and by. Thus the obstacles having been removed, the great trial was proceeded with, proofs were presented, arguments heard, and finally this judgment entered up:

The tribunal, by a majority of four votes to one, awards to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold, as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the decision of the tribunal.

Precedent to this finding, the nation for its own benefit gave up the claim for premature recognition of belligerent rights, insisted upon and finally compelled the adoption of the three rules, under which the tribunal held that proof of negligence was actual notice to the offending government, not knowledge of the people, not notoriety, not constructive notice, and enabled England to escape from damages caused by all the other cruisers except the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after Melbourne. Our Government for its own benefit consented to the preliminary finding of the arbitrators, thus excluding from their further consideration the national claims and the increased premiums of insurance as indirect. Clearly she had a right to barter her own claims for benefits to herself, and the exchange was pecuniarily satisfactory, for she received more than a quid pro quo. But did she deliberately sacrifice the claims of her suffering citizens to the same end without any purpose of compensation to them? Had she a moral right to do so? Allow me to quote from the able report of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-third Congress:

Having for its own interest withdrawn from the arbitrators the "cause and only cause of the evil," thus leaving the tribunal without evidence of that liability of England which the United States had over and over again in every diplomatic form insisted upon, is not the United States estopped from denying reparation to its citizens, based upon the finding of a tribunal to which, for its own purposes, it would not submit the evidence? Indeed, by so doing, did not our Government assume this class of losses of its citizens?—Report House Representatives Judiciary Committee, page 7.

I submit, sir, that it appears conclusively our country had no such unjust purpose. On the contrary, it deliberately and carefully provided for such contingency.

This letter of instructions shows it:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 8, 1871.

GENTLEMEN: The President having appointed you the counsel of the United States in the matter submitted to the tribunal of arbitration, to meet in Geneva, * * * it becomes necessary to give you briefly the President's instructions on the subject of your duties. * * *

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. * * * It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers, upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recoved in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government, without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal will be avoided in the argument of counsel.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant.

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. CALEB CUSHING, WILLIAM M. EVARTS, and M. R. WAITE.

Again and again our Government insisted that the award should, if possible, be for a gross sum. Why these instructions, why this anxiety? Clearly assessors would have relieved the Government and the Congress from all care and responsibility in the premises; why then seek to avoid an assessment as provided for in the treaty? There can be but one answer. Our Government, having for its own good sacrificed certain claims of its citizens, held itself morally responsible to those citizens, and, that it might distribute this award equitably to real sufferers, insisted upon a sum in gross and upon its right to dispose of it without any limitation.

Is there anything in the amount of the award, in the manner of arriving at it, antagonistic to this view? Can any man tell upon what figures it was based?

Again allow me to cite authorities:

It does not appear in the protocols how the arbitrators arrived at this amount. I am informed that it was reached by mutual concessions. The neutral arbitrators and Mr. Adams from the beginning of the proceedings were convinced of the policy of awarding a sum in gross. * * * We therefore devoted our energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the sum.—Mr. Davis's Report, volume 4, page 8.

How the amount of the award obtained at Geneva was made up, what precise species of losses it was intended to cover, or even how the interest was computed is not known, and a careful study of the opinions of the several arbitrators has shown us that it was not intended to be known outside of the tribunal itself. (Opinion of the Court of Alabama Claims, Williams vs. The United States.)

Again, by the terms of the award, the sum to be paid was to be a settlement in full, now and forever, of all the claims referred. Under the treaty all the claims I have heretofore alluded to were so referred. It makes no difference that some were decided against for the reasons given; they were none the less referred and forever settled by the judgment given:

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration * * * as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to; and further engage that every such claim * * * shall be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and henceforth inadmissible.—Treaty of Washington, article 11. And in accordance with the terms of article 11 of the said treaty, the tribunal declares that "all the claims referred to in the treaty as submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled."—Decision and Award Papers, &c., volume 4, page 53.

Now, sir, the conclusion seems to me inevitable that this money paid over by Great Britain is to be disposed to sufferers on the seas, in the discretion of Congress. That the Forty-third Congress adopted this view is clearly apparent from the provisions made for insurance companies. The bill allows them to receive their net losses caused by all confederate cruisers. There is no limitation to the three named by the tribunal, the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after Melbourne. If the strict constructionist is right, then Congress has already violated the terms of the award as much as it would have done if it had actually made the distribution our act, under consideration, provides for. So, too, the court created by that bill has shown its entire independence of the tribunal; for it has already given judgment in cases where the names of the claimants, the claims, the names of the ships destroyed were never suggested to or heard of by the arbitrators. If we are to be bound strictly by the tribunal, if the Government was the agent of claimants, their attorney, by what right does it provide for any claimant whatsoever who did not plead eo nomine in that august court? Sir, the conclusions are inevitable. England recklessly and wickedly did us a grievous wrong. Our citizens, outraged, damaged, thousands of them ruined, without legal redress, without power to compel England to right their wrongs, appealed to their Government. The nation as such appeared before a tribunal agreed upon as plaintiff against Great Britain as defendant, urged national and individual claims; for their own advantage yielded the greater portion of their claim, prosecuted the balance to final judgment, recovered $15,500,000, has already paid out about eight millions to sufferers, and now holds the balance to be distributed, in the discretion of Congress, to other sufferers.

And here allow me to place in the scales the admirable opinion of the court in Williams vs. The United States:

Let not the proper attitude of the claimant to the fund for distribution be misunderstood. Whatever his loss may have been, he had not the power to obtain compensation from Great Britain by his own act. Her army and navy would have proved uncomfortable obstacles in his way to her treasury. Just here the Government of the United States took up his case, and by the exercise of its powers as a sovereign, after years of patient labor, by the highest skill in diplomacy, without the loss of blood or treasure, obtained the whole amount due for the depredations complained of, thus achieving a triumph which may, in the progress of civilization, take a higher rank than the profoundest achievements in arms. How the amount of the award obtained at Geneva was made up, what precise species of losses it was intended to cover, or even how the interest was computed is not known, and a careful study of the opinions of the several arbitrators has shown us that it was not intended to be known outside of the tribunal itself. The Government of the United States accepted the sum awarded in full settlement of all the claims comprehended in the terms of the treaty, and soon afterward Congress passed the act providing for its distribution among the claimants, which is to be our chief guide in the actual work of distribution. It is clear that the Government had the right to prescribe the terms on which claimants should present their claims. They were not strong enough to compel payment of the money by Great Britain, and when this Government obtained it the claimants had no legal rights to it, except that which this Government, by its own acts, chose to accord. They must, therefore, take their respective shares of it, subject to all the conditions which the Government has thought fit to appoint, or not take them at all.

Now, what shall be done with this balance of twelve millions? The gentleman from Ohio says, cover it into the Treasury of the United States. What an act of piracy! The wrongs inflicted by England would pale in the presence of so much greater wrongs inflicted by the Republic upon its own citizens who suffered largely because they loved the flag of their country. Why so cover it into the Treasury? Because the war was prolonged, the cost increased, large sums expended in destroying cruisers for the purpose of protecting our commerce. To be sure. But the Government deliberately bargained all this and received for it an immense price—ample, complete satisfaction. Who questions its right to do as it pleases with its own? But, having thus disposed of it, shall it wickedly steal it back from its citizens who as such helped pay it, and thus not only refuse them protection and redress, but take from them the pittance the mercy of Great Britain awarded them? The proposition is too monstrous to argue, too outrageous to consider, too absurd to discuss.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAYNE] who has just closed expresses a very tender regard for Great Britain—intimates that she should be consulted as to the disposition of this fund. Sir, she has no lot in it, no right to express an opinion in relation to it. It is a judgment the United States recovered against her for wrong done. Let her be forever silent. The history I have given shows that the only act of hers toward us for the last fifteen years for which she should not blush with shame was that one of apology for her wrong, of submission to the tribunal at Geneva, and of payment of the award.

Mr. Speaker, time will not permit me to argue the question of the power of the Government over the $15,500,000. If the able and exhaustive arguments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS,] from New York, [Mr. LORD,] and from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] do not convince this House that the Congress of the United States may distribute the fund in its discretion, governed only by justice and equity, then no words of mine could. Your committee who made the report now under consideration, after careful and patient examination, agreed, without hesitation, without doubt, upon this proposition as the basis of their bill. They only departed from it when they admitted the insurance companies to a participation in the distribution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] has entered a motion to strike out that clause. I sincerely hope the House will strike it out.

The bill under consideration provides, first, for those who were damaged by cruisers other than the so-called inculpated—the Alabama, the Florida, the Shenandoah after Melbourne.

EXCULPATED CRUISERS.

Whence comes this distinction between "inculpated" and "exculpated" cruisers? It is certainly, in fact, a distinction without a difference.

Take the Shenandoah as an illustration. She was built, armed, and equipped in England; her officers and crew shipped there, largely made up of the very men England saved from the sinking Alabama. Her preparations for sea were well known, her purposes well understood. She put to sea; at once commenced her depredations upon our commerce; finally went into Melbourne to coal. The United States consul protested against her rendering assistance; furnished evidence of her character to the British authorities; but his protests were of no avail. Again she sailed, burning ship after ship. The tribunal holds England liable for all damages done by her after leaving Melbourne, harmless for all caused before. Just prior to her arrival at Melbourne she burned a Union ship, took the captain, his wife, the other officers and men, into that port. Are the owners of that ship, is that captain, and are those sailors any less entitled to recompense than those of the ship burned two days after she left that port? Whence cometh the distinction? Before she arrived at Melbourne she burned the ship of Mr. Metcalf, a worthy constituent of the gentleman from Ohio, who, hearing of the destruction, and that the Shenandoah had gone to England, started at once for the purpose of libeling her. At New York he received notice that she had been turned over to the United States, sold, and the proceeds, more than sufficient to pay his entire loss, covered into the United States Treasury. Of course, if there had been any remedy in the proposed libels, this action of the Government had taken it away, and Mr. Metcalf returned home. For three years now he has been in constant attendance at this Capitol, seeking reparation. His whole fortune wrested from him by this British cruiser, her wrong admitted, her piratical cruise stopped, herself sold because of her crime against this American citizen, the purchase-money now in our Treasury, with millions added to it by the judgment of a court, and he still asking for bread and receiving a stone. And yet the gentleman from Ohio declares it to be his deliberate opinion that the United States, which certainly owed to her citizen protection, failed to render it, shall now hold on to every dollar she has so received, and his outraged constituent remain without remedy, because the Shenandoah, when this burning took place, had not coaled at Melbourne, but had, to be sure, in other English ports; in fact, had never turned her prow into a confederate port during the whole of her piratical career!

Again, sir, take the Georgia, another "exculpated" cruiser. She, too, was built, armed, provisioned and equipped, officered and manned, in an English port. All of her crew but two were Englishmen. She never saw a confederate port, nor sailed within the shore-line of those States. All of her preparations for sea, her purposes in sailing, were notorious. Our minister, Mr. Adams, had all the information for a week before she sailed, and yet the tribunal held England harmless in respect to the damages she caused, and gentlemen on this floor can see no reason in law, equity, justice, or good conscience why our Government should seek to repair the wrongs the Georgia committed upon her inoffending citizens—loyal subjects, every day paying heavy requisitions for the protection of that very country, owing it to them and failing utterly to afford it. The log-books of nearly all these cruisers would be only a repetition of the same story. Who questions the liability of Great Britain for all the damages done by all these cruisers under the stipulations of the Clarendon-Johnson treaty? Now when that treaty was rejected only for advantages our Government would receive; when we deliberately, for ample compensation, relieved England from this class of claims, is not it a monstrous doctrine that our nation, who in the hour of her peril exacted from her citizens such terrible sacrifices, shall now, when her life has been purchased with their treasure and their blood, thus coldly, selfishly, and wickedly profit at their further expense?

Again, sir, how did the tribunal draw so sharp a line, holding England liable alone for the acts of the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after Melbourne? I have already cited the three rules relating to negligence—rules urged, insisted upon by the United States—rules the adoption of which would be of inestimable value to us in the future when we should be the neutral nation. We succeeded in obtaining their adoption, and under them we insisted, and the tribunal undoubtedly held the only proof of negligence to be official notice to the offending nation and a refusal to act upon it. Only by such a construction could the liability of England have been limited as it was and this line so sharply defined. Who can estimate the value to us of these rules and this construction? Let war be declared between England and France, the United States being a neutral power, with ship-yards all along our immense seaboard, up and down our mighty rivers, with our thousands and tens of thousands of ports and harbors, with our skilled mechanics and adventurous sailors, our whole people incited by the memories of the past and the hopes of the future, how many cruisers would plow the seas in sixty days of whose existence our Government had received no official notice and for whose acts we could not be held liable?

To gain this immense advantage the claims of our citizens for losses sustained by the depredations of the so-called "exculpated" cruisers were deliberately surrendered, settled in full and forever. Now, sir, can it be said, honestly, fairly, that our nation in justice and equity has no obligation remaining to these sufferers?

The next class provided for is those who paid

WAR PREMIUMS.

Who are the so-called war-premium men, and what are their rights in this award? As I said, over one-third of our ocean tonnage sought the protection of the British flag, and by so doing was insured safety and profit. The remainder continued under our flag, exposed to danger and without profit. There were British cruisers crossing every path, and every day a scuttled ship gave warning. I say without profit. It is claimed by insurance attorneys that their voyages were successful; that this was the inducement which kept them under the flag. The proposition is absurd. It is claimed by the same attorneys that the war premiums paid by them were charged against their freights, and then by the merchants against the consumers of the merchandise. This is equally absurd. They had to contend with that great leveler of prices, competition. If the merchant paid for goods freighted in the American bottom 5 per cent. war risk, his neighbor, shipping his goods in the British ship, was not subjected to this expense, and the merchandise of both sought the same market. How, then, could the first mark up his increased cost of transportation?

The ship-owner affords a more marked illustration of the point. Suppose two ships, lying side by side at the wharf of the foreign port, the one under the American flag, the other under the British. The owners of the American pay, first, a war premium on their ship, but some one must also pay it on the cargo. Who does that? Not the owner of it, because he can just as well send it by the vessel sailing under the British flag, where no such charge would be necessary. So the owners of this ship must also pay the extra premium on the cargo. Then do they offer equal inducements to the shipper? Certainly not, for there is in the first ship the risk of detention, of partial loss, of failure of underwriter, of litigation for money in event of loss. Then, to secure the freight, the poor ship-owner is obliged to offer lower freight charges. Can any reply be made to this? What was the result? The most of these vessels sailing under our flag were run without profit, many of them at great loss. But, says some skeptic, "Why in the name of common sense did they sail at all? Why did not they all take safety and profit under a foreign flag?" My answer is that thousands of those men loved the old flag too well to desert it; hated the English ensign too profoundly to seek safety under it. Does not the history I have given of British wrong toward us in our terrible conflict for national life justify the hatred? Again, our ships were confined to the coarsest, cheapest, and heaviest freights. No American ship lying at Canton or Pekin could take silk or tea. The war premium would be three times the freight money. So at Calcutta and many other ports.

Again, the relations between ship and owner are frequently full of sentiment. Every gentleman knows what an affection sometimes grows up for the horse, the house, the farm, for the things used until they become a part of the family. This is peculiarly true of the ship. A father and his sons have built her; have put in her the earnings of their lives; have watched her building from the laying of her keel to the day of her marriage to the ocean; have named her for the wife or sister; have sailed the world over in her, in calm and in tempest, in heat and in cold. She is their ship and they love her as one of their own. Would they, loving their country, hating its enemies, lower the good old flag and hoist in its place the emblem of injustice and wrong? Again, it is a very common thing for a whole neighborhood to own a ship. The captain, the carpenter, the blacksmith, the lumberman, the iron merchant, each takes his share in her; she is the parish ship, owned, loved, and the pride of them all. Shall she be sold to the foreigner or sail under any other than the Stars and Stripes? They would let her rot at the wharf first. Again, there were men, ship-owners and merchants, so loyal to the country in her hour of peril, in her day of dire distress, that no loss of mere money could drive them to any seeming desertion of her. These were the men who kept our flag at the peak throughout the whole war. These are the men who saved to the country her commerce. To them you owe the million and a half of ocean tonnage you held when the war was over, a debt of gratitude you ought to cheerfully acknowledge. Some of these ship-owners were their own insurers, and occasionally the Alabama, the Florida, or the Shenandoah after Melbourne swooped down upon the ships and destroyed them.

After a dozen years of weary waiting, the last Congress provided for the payment of such loss, and to-day the United States Treasurer is issuing to them warrants for that purpose. But the Tallahassee, Georgia, and cruisers called exculpated, equally British ships, manned by British sailors, inspired by British hatred for their rival on the seas, scuttle and burn others, and because these are of the so-called "exculpated cruisers" such losses are still unprovided for, and to-day appeals are made to you in the name of justice for reparation. But others, and by far the larger proportion, were compelled to insure. When the Sumter destroyed the Golden Rocket, and the courts held the insurance companies harmless under the ordinary marine policy, they had ships sailing every sea, anchored in every harbor, lying at every wharf, freighted with valuable cargoes. There was but one door of safety for them, and the insurance company was its keeper. What mercy had they to expect from these soulless corporations? Could they be inspired by patriotism or moved by sentiment? No. They adjusted their own rates for war-risks, having regard only to the profits of the business, and the ship's owner must comply with their exactions. He did so, paid them millions of dollars in excess of their losses, and now looks to you for remuneration. He saved your commerce, he kept your merchant-ships afloat, he honored your flag, gave credit to your country at an expense of millions of dollars to him, and in hundreds of cases the price he paid was ruin.

You have money enough forced from Great Britain by a judgment of the court to re-imburse him for the tax his loyalty compelled him to pay; and is there any reason why you should withhold it?

INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has stood directly in the way of a fair, just, and equitable distribution of this award? Three years have elapsed since it was paid into our Treasury, more than twelve years since the greater part of the damage was done. In the mean time our citizens have suffered that terrible sickness of hope deferred. The time has surely been ample, the losses clear, the means of reparation abundant. Who has blocked the door of justice? The insurance companies. Corporations of immense wealth and power, easily united in active, aggressive war upon every measure of relief which declined to name them as the first and most meritorious claimants, having agents and attorneys in every considerable town in the country, unlimited command of men and money, able to mass their whole strength at a moment's warning, and hurl it upon Congress, able and willing to employ scores of the leading men of the land, entitled to the privileges of this floor, and keep them on guard during a whole session of Congress, while, opposed to them, are the impoverished ship-owners and sailors, scattered all over the world; the men from whom they exacted all and more than all the profits of the carrying trade during the whole war, equally scattered, without agents, unable to employ attorneys. The battle is terribly unequal, and were it not for a high sense of justice, an independence of thought and action, an incorruptible purpose to do right pervading the members of Congress, there would be but one result, but one prize, and these companies would hold the lucky ticket. Before the last Congress they waged a tremendous battle, contested every step, fought for their millions with increasing vigilance, with great power and unquestioned ability; even when in the last ditch they never lost heart, but resorted to stratagem and cunning devices, looking us square in the face as if honest, asked for leave to go to the courts, prevailed upon the Nestor of the House, the white-haired, renowned, and revered Poland to advocate their cunning proposition, and failed, as they ought, ingloriously. They did however, I admit, succeed in obtaining an advantage of all other claimants in securing payment for all their net losses, regardless of any distinction between "inculpated" and "exculpated" cruisers; and yet they are not happy.

A distinguished judge was once arguing a case before the judiciary committee of the Legislature of Maine, in which he concluded that the petitioner, "Richard Doe," could not be satisfied, that it was fortunate for the world there was but one "Doe," that a few more would absorb all the things of time and enter eternity crying "not enough!" Said he, if Satan had taken Richard into a high mountain and offered him all the possessions of the earth, he would have cried "not enough!" "not enough!" I am inclined to think that if Satan should take these insurance companies (and I guess he will) [laughter] into a high mountain and make them the same offer their response would be "not enough." [Laughter.]

Again they are here in full force, repeating vigorously their demands. Now, Mr. Speaker, why are they entitled to another day in court? What reasons do they give?

First. They claim that this Government was their attorney to collect these very damages, and having succeeded, but one other duty remains, to pay over to the clients. What an idea! Our great nation the agent of insurance companies, as such spending years of negotiations, levying contributions on the first intellects of the land, making requisitions upon the honorable Senate of the United States, drafting into service the President, threatening war with England, all to collect the bills of insurance companies! And what bills? Why, damages inflicted by English cruisers. Suppose for a moment that our Government held these claims alone, appeared before the tribunal, and presented their case. England answers, what are the losses of your clients for which you enter complaint? O, there are no losses! When you recognized belligerent rights so hastily, created such widespread consternation, these companies at once took advantage of the fears of our citizens, adjusted the rates of insurance so as to make the operation a perfectly safe one, made millions of dollars, and heaped up wealth at the rate of 25, 30, and 40 per cent. annually. The reply of England would surely be: We have done these companies no harm by your own showing; on the contrary, we have poured wealth into their coffers, and you have no suit which in justice can be maintained against us. The tribunal would have certainly adjudged the answer satisfactory. Does any one doubt this? The counsel for Great Britain, in the proceedings before the tribunal, did at once raise this question. I quote from him:

> With respect to the insurance companies it must be remembered that, as against the losses which they paid, they received the benefit of the enormous war premiums which ruled at that time, and that these were the risks against which they indemnified themselves—and, it cannot be doubted, so as to make their business profitable upon the whole—by those extraordinary premiums.

If these companies had been the only claimants would our Government have taken a step toward an adjustment?

Again, Mr. Evarts, attorney-in-chief of these corporations, while earnestly arguing the matter of agency, on being asked what should be done with those companies who put in no appearance whatever, replied: They should be paid out of the money collected. And yet there was no privity between them and the great attorney. Curious agency that!

Secondly. They rest their claim on the doctrine of subrogation; certainly a very taking one with lawyers. No one questions the soundness of the legal position. That the underwriter is subrogated to all the rights of the insured in event of partial loss and abandonment is beyond dispute, and if there is any legal claim against a wrong-doer for the damages done the company may prosecute it in their own behalf. But has the doctrine any application in this case? Clearly not.

Before any of the depredations complained of had taken place Great Britain had recognized the belligerent rights of the confederacy. Then, as a logical sequence, no man injured in his person or property had any legal claim against the injurer, nor can it be pretended that any individual sufferer had any claim recognized in law against England. The recognition of belligerent rights had been deliberately waived by our Government as the basis of claim. But suppose it had not been, could the underwriter bring any suit against the English government and maintain it? Her reply would have been, "If I have offended, my offense is against your Government, not against you. I am answerable only to her." Was it in the power of these insurance companies to enforce their claims. There is infinite pretense in all this talk of subrogation. The companies knew perfectly well, when they adjusted their rates, that in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred the ship insured, if injured at all, would be entirely destroyed; that there would be no practical remedy against anybody for the destruction; therefore they did not take into consideration or make any allowance whatever for benefits to be derived from their favorite legal position. In the ordinary risks these legal rights with which they are clothed are credited in adjusting the premium. The war rates are conclusive evidence that no such allowance was made to the insured against war risks. The immense, unprecedented profits of the business ought to be a satisfactory reply to the claim. An "unknown poet" seems to have fully understood the case when he wrote—

> From him who hath not should be taken away
> Even that which he hath, and be given
> Unto him who hath all, the insurance men say;
> And, gods! for this rule how they've striven!
> Late and early they've labored with might and with main
> To dishonor the faith of the nation,
> While their lawyers, a host without number, maintain
> That sheer theft is but plain "subrogation."

Thirdly. They insist that they were before the tribunal and their claims were allowed. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the whole case in support of this theory. They were before the arbitrators, but they were there as witnesses, nothing more. There claims were only proofs of the amount of losses. The quotations so abundantly made by the insurance attorneys in support of this position are from the dissenting opinion of one of the judges, Cockburn, entitled to no weight whatever.

Fourthly. They come with a special and specious plea: We are mutual companies, merchants and ship-owners making up a pool. If a vessel is lost, the pool pays the insurance, and at the close of each year a balance is struck, and so much of the pool as remains is paid out to the contributors. Now pay over to us, and we will distribute to the very men who paid the war premiums. But the war-premium claimants reply, there are leeches in your companies, presidents, directors, actuaries, attorneys, fine buildings, extravagant rents; there, too, are all of the immense expenditures for agents, lobbyists, attorneys, employed for the last five years against our interests. When you have charged off against us all these expenses, how much of a dividend will be declared? Heaven save us from any such guardianship. We remember vividly the distribution of the Columbian Mutual. A brief statement of its character and career will be useful in throwing light upon this fourth proposition.

Columbian Mutual Insurance Company, organized August, 1857. From the annual report made January 1, 1861, before war risks were known, I find total assets $1,228,684.77; excess of losses and expenses over earned premiums for the year 1860, $86,271.19. But the war risks soon changed the fortune of this company. For January, 1864, they report total assets, $3,140,930.80; profit for the year 1863, $1,137,163.33, after reserving for estimated claims unadjusted and other contingencies $441,206.49, profit to be divided, $695,974.52. Of this residue 30 per cent. will be paid in cash to the stockholders on and after March 10, 1864; on old stock 12 per cent., on new stock 10. There will also be a scrip dividend on and after June 1, 1864, on the cash capital; on old stock 7 per cent., on new 5; making the total dividend for the year paid to stockholders 26 per cent.

This company is partly stock, partly mutual, having no resemblance whatever to that Utopian pool company so earnestly urged before the Judiciary Committee. Shortly after this report the company failed, distributed their assets, but in the distribution only gave the creditors 5 per cent. What became of all the rest its creditors are anxious to know. It was not lost in its war business, for the whole claim of this company is a little more than $700,000. Would not this company be an excellent guardian for these war-premium men, understanding so thoroughly as it seems the art of distributing the smallest possible sum to its creditors?

This statement shows further how little of truth there is in the character claimed for these mutual companies. The fact is they are nearly all mongrel, half stock and half mutual.

Take the Atlantic Mutual of New York, paraded by all these insurance attorneys as the paragon, the model mutual company, a claimant too against this fund for $1,760,615. I said the Columbian claimed $705,608; so these two companies claim nearly one-half of the whole amount sought to be received by all the companies, forty in number.

ATLANTIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

In 1824 the Atlantic Insurance Company, a stock concern, was chartered and organized, did business for eighteen years, paid a net profit of 350 per cent. on its original capital—a remarkable success—and yet in 1842 it adopted the mutual plan. What was its motive? Certainly not charity. An examination of its charter and the insurance laws of New York will show. Twenty-one of the original stockholders obtained the charter. In examining this, I take an abstract made by Mr. Moore, of San Francisco, whose direct and indirect losses ruined him, and who died seeking his rights of Congress:

Section 10 provides that policy-holders, on risks not marked off, upon which the premium is not less than $100, shall be entitled to one vote for each $100 of such premium until the outstanding scrip of the company shall amount to $500,000.

Section 11. Scrip-holders to the amount of $100, issued in the name of such holders, shall be entitled to one vote for each $100 of such scrip.

Section 13 provides that "annual dividend statements shall be made, which shall contain a fair estimate of the net profits of the company not before divided, up to and including the last day of each year, taking into view the probable amount to be paid on all claims and demands which have been or may be made against the company." After ascertaining in this mode the net profits of each period on risks marked off, the board of trustees may declare a dividend, and the officers of the company may issue certificates of a certain percentage on the premiums received for such marked-off risks, to the persons in whose names the policies of insurance were originally made or to their representatives.

Section 19 provides that the trustees of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company may take from themselves, as stockholders in the Atlantic Insurance Company, one-half of the stock and assets of the latter company, on such terms and for such periods as they can agree with themselves, and pay legal interest thereon, and authorizes them to appropriate and pay profits thereon pro rata upon the amounts received, with the premiums subsequently earned.

Section 13 declares the amounts named in the scrip certificates to be conclusive, whether accepted or not. Persons entitled to such scrip can, therefore, have no claims upon surplus earnings. It also declares that such scrip shall be a percentage on the premiums received, thereby excluding policy-holders from participating in the interest derived from the large amount of invested capital.

Section 1 permits any mutual marine insurance company then existing, or that might thereafter be chartered by the Legislature or be incorporated under any general law of the State of New York, to create or unite with its existing funds a cash capital of not less than $300,000, to be divided into shares of $1.0 each.

Section 2 provides for payment of 7 per cent. interest on such capital, and permits the payment to the holders of stock capital, in cash, one-third of all the net profits of the business; the other two-thirds of net profits to be paid in scrip to persons entitled by the charter or articles of association to participate in its profits.

Section 4 provides that holders of cash capital or stock shall be entitled to one vote, at all elections, for each share of stock; that no person shall be entitled to vote at any election by reason of holding either policies of insurance or certificates of scrip, thereby annulling sections 10 and 11 of the charter of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and depriving policy and scrip holders of all mutual marine insurance companies of membership, making scrip-holders simply creditors of the companies and their claims subject to be canceled at the discretion of a board of trustees, in whose election they have no voice.

CHARTER AND BY-LAWS.

This is that model company of merchants contributing to a pool. See, now, how successfully it operated.

I quote from the New York Insurance Reports, 1861, volume 1, page 527. The Atlantic Mutual was organized 1872. Total assets January 1, 1861, $6,646,292.10; profits for 1860, $1,594,000. Six per cent. interest on the outstanding certificates of profit will be paid to the holders thereof on and after the 5th of February, 1861.

After reserving two and one-half millions of dollars profits, the outstanding certificates of 1859 will be paid to the holders thereof. * * * A dividend of 35 per cent. cash is declared on the net earned premiums for the year ending December 31, 1860.

For the year 1862, 40 per cent., free from Government tax, is declared.

Again, from reports of 1864. Total amount of assets January 1, 1864, $9,265,546.32; net earnings remaining with the company, $5,268,670; profits for 1863, $2,630,000, after reserving three and one-half million dollars of profit. Certificates of the issue of the year 1862 will be paid. A dividend of 40 per cent. is declared.

Now, whose was the $6,600,000 assets and the two and one half millions of reserved profits January, 1867, on the increased assets, and the three and one half millions reserved profits January, 1864? Certainly it did not belong to the temporary policy-holders. They, in receiving their 20, 30, 35, and 40 per cent. dividends, had settled and canceled all their interests in and claims upon the company. Of course it belonged to the company. The losses were paid from a general fund, and the profits went into a general fund. Only a part was ever returned, the balance accumulating for somebody's benefit. Whose? Now, these are fair samples of the New York mutual insurance companies; their profits through the war a fair average. I annex a table showing the operations of these companies.

Is not the impudence of these companies without parallel in the history of Congress? They not only ask but they demand about the whole of this fund, and they insist that the nation will be dishonored if they do not receive it. I trust this House will accept the dishonor meekly, rather than do the injustice they claim.

Synopis of the business of the several insurance companies in the city of New York hereinafter named for the several years as stated, made from their own returns.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I am willing, on account of this being private-bill day, to yield the Geneva award bill in favor of private bills on condition that I can regain the floor in the morning, when after a short debate I propose to move the previous question and take a vote to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The interposition of other business does not deprive the gentleman from New York of his right in respect to that bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] has addressed the Chair. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I merely wish to state that immediately after the special order which has now been under consideration, the Geneva award bill, there stands upon the Calendar the report of the Committee on Texas Border Troubles.

I desire to state to the House that while the Geneva award bill has been before the House for two or three weeks, the report of the Committee on Texas Border Troubles has been elbowed back and elbowed back; and I wish in a few words to state the history of that report.

One of the very earliest acts of this House when it assembled was to appoint a committee to examine into the state of the Texas border. That committee, after considerable labor, submitted to the House a report on the 4th of April. That report was made the special order for the 20th of April, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of. Ever since that time it has been postponed from one day to another for the sake of one measure or another. One day it was a bill for the relief of some defaulting tax-collector. Next day it was a bill on which some speculators had an interest how millions in the Treasury were to be divided. In one way or another this measure for the protection of our people on the border has been elbowed back. I expect it will be elbowed back again; and I wish our people to understand it.

The Legislature of Texas is at this time and has been in session for some time, and they have again and again asked the question whether they themselves must make provision for the protection of the national frontier if Congress does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is proceeding by unanimous consent, and objection is made to further discussion. The Chair will state the precise position on the Calendar of the bill referred to by the gentleman. It is among the special orders under the head of reports of committees and bills undisposed of. The order now before the House in charge of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] is succeeded by an order of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The next order is that of the gentleman from Texas, and the question of consideration will be raised as soon as it is reached.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I merely wish to understand the matter. The Geneva award bill may be hanging over this House for two or three months longer, so far as I can see.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot determine that matter.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following invitation from the president of the United States Centennial Commission; which was read, and referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration:

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION 1876,
UNITED STATES CENTENNIAL COMMISSION,
Philadelphia, June 29, 1876.

SIR: The United States Centennial Commission respectfully invite the House of Representatives to attend the national commemoration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, in Independence Square, Philadelphia, July 4, at ten a. m. The necessary cards have been sent to the members individually. The programme is inclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
President United States Centennial Commission.

The Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

PAWNEE AND OTOE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations for survey of the Pawnee and Otoe Indian reservations in Kansas and Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ALBERT W. PRESTON.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 928, for the relief of Albert W. Preston, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now insist upon my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Before that motion is put, I ask unanimous consent that this may be considered as objection day, it being the fifth Friday since the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on objection day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order can be made by unanimous consent only.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman yield to me to obtain an order of the House to print some testimony?

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot yield further at this time; I have been compelled to refuse several gentlemen who have asked me to yield.

The motion of Mr. BRIGHT was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

Mr. JOYCE. I believe when the House was last in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar the pending bill was House bill No. 344 to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. That was when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on some other than objection day. By order of the House business to-day will be as on objection day. The Clerk will now report the bill next in order on objection day.

RICHARD HALE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3366) for the relief of the legal representatives of Richard Hale, deceased.

Mr. JOYCE objected to the consideration of the bill.

WILLIAM GEMMILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3114) for the relief of William Gemmill, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

The bill appropriates the sum of $75 to William Gemmill, of Yankton, in the Territory of Dakota, in full payment for quartering and boarding United States soldiers during a terrific snow storm in April, 1873.

The amendment was to strike out "$75" and insert "$36."

The amendment was agreed to.

No objection being made, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ALFRED ROULAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3367) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Alfred Rouland.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion now standing upon the records of the War Department against the name of Alfred Rouland, late of the Twenty-third and Twenty-eighth Regiments Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and to grant to said Rouland an honorable discharge as of the date of April 16, 1866, with the same pay and bounty he would have been entitled to if he had been honorably discharged the military service on said day.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

That from the testimony in this case it appears that the said Alfred Rouland was enrolled and mustered into the Twenty-third Michigan Infantry on the 18th day of January, 1864, "for three years or during the war." He was at the time of his muster a mere youth, of less than seventeen years of age. It is in evidence that he served with marked fidelity during Sherman's campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and in Thomas's campaign in Tennessee, including the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and afterward in the capture of Fort Anderson and Wilmington, North Carolina.

The captain of his company, John Hamilton, (now a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church,) testifies "that during said Rouland's connection with said company, before his transfer to the Twenty-eighth Michigan Infantry, he was always a brave, faithful, and efficient soldier, and never for a moment flinched in any duty; that he was one of the best soldiers of said company, though being then a mere stripling of seventeen or eighteen years; and that it is his confident belief that said Rouland would have been one of the last men in the Army to have intentionally deserted, and that he is entitled to an honorable discharge on account of his faithful service.

In June, 1865, the Twenty-third Regiment was mustered out of service, and young Rouland was transferred to the Twenty-eighth Michigan Infantry, and made a corporal in Company F of that regiment. The testimony of Lieutenant C. H. DeClute, commanding the company in this regiment, says: "During the time he (Rouland) was with me, which was till after the conclusion of hostilities, he was a brave, faithful, and efficient soldier. When he left the company he was sick, and I am of opinion that he was in great danger of dying. There was, I am convinced, no intention on his part to desert, but his action was a desperate attempt to save his life. Before he could rejoin his regiment it was mustered out." The petitioner left the hospital at Wilmington on the 16th of April, 1866, nearly one year after hostilities had ceased. His regiment returned to Michigan, and was mustered out soon afterward. It is in testimony that he had suffered some time previously from fever and ague and intermittent fevers, and was much emaciated and reduced in strength and spirits, so much so that after reaching the home of his brother in Michigan his life for some time was considered in great danger, and he did not wholly recover for months afterward.

In view of the premises, and especially considering the long and faithful service of this young soldier, extending to a period of nearly a year beyond the fair construction of his contract of service with the Government, and the despondent condition of his mind resulting from the peculiar and severe character of the petitioner's illness, your committee are of the opinion that the stigma of desertion should be removed from his military record, and that he is justly entitled to an honorable discharge.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CALEB L. BRAYTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1997) to grant titles to certain lands to the heirs of Caleb L. Brayton, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims with an amendment.

The preamble of the bill, as proposed to be amended, states that by virtue of the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 4, 1842, known as the armed-occupation act, Caleb L. Brayton, now deceased, settled and acquired a right to one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands in Brevard County, in the State of Florida, and became entitled to a patent therefor; and before the issue of patent to said Brayton the land so acquired had been patented to the State of Florida under act of September 28, 1850, and said State of Florida refuses to surrender said patent for cancellation.

The bill provides that the heirs of Caleb L. Brayton, who, under permit No. 236, are entitled to locate and enter the northwest quarter and southeast quarter of fractional section 1, in township 36 south, of range 40 east, may, in lieu thereof, locate and enter other public lands in the same county open for entry to an amount not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to issue patent for the same.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

NORTHWESTERN IMPROVEMENT COMPANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 176) to authorize the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to enter upon the Menomonee Indian reservation and improve the Oconto River, its branches and tributaries.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the assent of Congress be, and hereby is, given to the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to improve the Oconto River and its branches and tributaries, so as to run logs down said river, its branches and tributaries, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in accordance with the laws of said State: Provided, That any damages which may be caused by such improvement shall be awarded as in all other cases under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and the amount be paid into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of said Indians; and said Indians and all other persons shall be permitted to use said river for the purpose of running logs, as contemplated in this act; and the charges for said privileges shall be regulated by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin: Provided, That all privileges under this act may be altered or revoked by Congress.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS OF WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) to aid the Winnebago Indians to obtain subsistence by agricultural pursuits, and to promote their civilization.

The preamble and joint resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas a large number of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin have selected and settled in good faith upon homestead claims under section 15 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875; and all said Indians have signified their desire and purpose to abandon their tribal relations, and adopt the habits and customs of civilized people, and avail themselves of the provisions of the act aforesaid, but in many instances are unable to do so on account of their extreme poverty: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and instructed to expend, for the benefit of the Winnebago Indians in Wisconsin, the proportion of the tribal annuities due to and set apart for said Indians under the act of June 25, 1864, of the appropriations for the tribe of Winnebago Indians for the fiscal year 1876, amounting to $16,173.69, to be expended as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That immediately after the passage of this resolution the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an enrollment to be made of the said Wisconsin Winnebago Indians, enrolling such only as were residing in the State of Wisconsin on the 1st day of January, 1876, and those who are entitled to the benefits of the act of March 3, 1875.

SEC. 3. That said sum shall be paid to the persons whose names appear upon such enrollment, each person receiving the same amount, heads of families being permitted to receive the full amount to which all the members of the family are entitled: Provided, That before any person shall be entitled to the benefits accruing under this resolution it shall be made to appear that the person claiming its benefits has taken up a homestead in accordance with the said act of March 3, 1875, or that, being unable to fully comply with the said act by reason of poverty, he or she has made a selection of lands as a homestead with a bona fide intention to comply with said act, and that the money applied for will be used to enable such person to fully complete a homestead right under said act: Provided, That no person shall receive more than the pro rata share of said sum to which he would have been entitled if living upon the reservation.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

BENJAMIN L. CORNISH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

(Objected to by Mr. FORT.)

MAJOR FOSTER A. HIXON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army.

(Objected to by Mr. TERRY.)

LAURENCE A. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3371) to place Laurence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry United States Army, upon the retired list of the Army.

The bill was read. It directs the President to place on the list of retired officers of the Army the name of Laurence A. Williams, late major of the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, with the rank of major, but he is to be entitled to pay as major only from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. WILSON called for the reading of the report; and it was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1847) for the relief of Laurence A. Williams, submit the following report:

Laurence A. Williams graduated from the United States Military Academy, and was appointed brevet second lieutenant 1st of July, 1852; first lieutenant, 20th July, 1856; captain, 1st July, 1861; and major of the Sixth United States Infantry, September 7, 1861. He was aid-de-camp to Brevet Brigadier-General A. S. Johnston from the 1st of June, 1858, to the 1st of August, 1860, and acting assistant adjutant-general of the Department of Utah from February 29 to August 21, 1860; on duty at headquarters Department of Washington and on mustering duty at Columbus, Ohio, to May, 1861; aid-de-camp to General McClellan from May to September 7, 1862, and with his regiment, and in command of it, from 27th day of March to 26th day of June, 1862. The regimental returns of the Sixth Cavalry for June, 1862, reported Major Williams in Washington, "sick, since June 26, 1862." He was subsequently reported absent without leave. This was afterward corrected on the records, Major Williams furnishing the proper surgeon's certificate of his sickness. On the 11th of March, 1863, he was summarily dismissed the service by order of the Secretary of War. There were no papers of record on which this action was based, nor did the Secretary of War communicate his reasons for ordering dismissal. The committee, believing that injustice was done this officer by his summary dismissal, recommend this bill as a substitute for the original bill, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN AMMAHIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1075) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounty account of John Ammahie or Ammahe.

The bill was read. It directs the Second Auditor of the Treasury to settle the claim for pay and bounty of John Ammahe or Ammahie, of Companies E and H of the Forty-third New York Volunteers, and to issue a certificate for such amount as appears to be due, any charge of desertion upon any rolls of the regiment to the contrary notwithstanding.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SEWELL B. CORBETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3372) for the relief of Sewell B. Corbett, of Alexandria County, Virginia.

(Objected to by Mr. FORT, and Mr. BURCHARD of Illinois.)

ESTHER P. FOX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1238) granting a pension to Esther P. Fox.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Esther P. Fox, of Buffalo, New York, widow of Augustus C. Fox, late a second lieutenant in Lieutenant-Colonel Chapin's regiment, New York militia, in the war of 1812, on the pension-roll, and to pay her a pension of $15 per month from February 14, 1871, during her natural life.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SUSAN E. WILLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of Susan E. Willard, widow of Sylvester D. Willard, of New York.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Susan E. Willard, widow of the late Sylvester D. Willard, of New York, the sum of $3,500, in full compensation for use and occupation of City Hotel, and brick residence adjoining the same, and furniture therein, used for hospital purposes, in Murfreesborough, Tennessee, in the years 1863 and 1864, by the order of military authorities of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the report; and it was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers for the relief of Mrs. Susan E. Willard, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

That the said Susan E. Willard is the widow of the late Brigadier-General Sylvester D. Willard, formerly surgeon-general of the State of New York; that she married the said Sylvester D. Willard before the war, and that he resided at the time in the city of Albany, in the State of New York; that before and at the time of her marriage she resided at Murfreesborough, Tennessee; that at the time and previous to her said marriage she and her sister, Sarah A. Spence, were joint owners of certain property in the town of Murfreesborough, Tennessee, known as the City Hotel, which property was taken possession of by order of General Geary, then commanding that post, for the purpose of establishing a general military hospital.

A brick residence adjoining said hotel, owned by same parties, was also taken possession of by military authority and used as a hospital and medical director's office, under charge of Medical-Director Surgeon-General J. Moses.

Mrs. Willard, the memorialist, submits to your committee certificates of various officers on duty at Murfreesborough, Tennessee, showing the occupancy of this property at various times for military purposes.

It also appears to the satisfaction of your committee that the furniture in said hotel and brick residence adjoining was also taken possession of and used for hospital purposes, or so much thereof as was adapted to and useful for that purpose.

It appears from a report made by Quartermaster-General Major-General M. C. Meigs, of date July 18, 1865, "that the City Hotel was held in possession by the United States forces from January 6, 1863, until June 6, 1863, and from November 18, 1863, to September 30, 1864. The dwelling-house was occupied for hospital purposes and medical director's office January 5, 1863, and retained until June 1, 1864."

This report is sustained by the affidavit of Miss Sarah A. Spence, of Murfreesborough, Tennessee, one of the joint owners of the property above mentioned and described, bearing date May 4, 1865.

From the said report it appears that the City Hotel was occupied by military authority for a period of fifteen months and twelve days, and that the brick residence adjoining was occupied for sixteen months and twenty-seven days.

From the evidence submitted, and considering the purposes for which the property was used, your committee are of the opinion that a reasonable and proper compensation for the use of said hotel would be $125 per month, and for the brick residence adjoining, $50 per month, making in all, for use and occupation of said premises, the sum of $2,770.

It appears that much of the furniture in said buildings, which amounted to more than $2,000, was destroyed; but a portion of it was used for hospital purposes, such as beds, bedding, chairs, and many other articles of like character. Your committee think that the sum of $730 should be paid the memorialist for furniture belonging to her and used in said buildings for hospital purposes.

On the 22d day of March, 1876, Miss Sarah A. Spence, one of the joint owners of this property, assigned by written assignment, duly acknowledged before a notary public, under his seal, at the city of Albany, New York, all her right, title, and interest in and to this claim against the United States to Susan E. Willard, the memorialist, making her the sole and only owner thereof.

The loyalty of the claimant is not questioned or doubted, as, at the time this claim arose, she was the wife of Surgeon-General Sylvester D. Willard, a true and loyal citizen of the State of New York, with whom she then resided. It was also shown by the verbal statement of Mrs. Willard, the memorialist, that at the time of the occupation of this property by authority of the United States her sister, Sarah A. Spence, was a minor, and therefore her loyalty is not questioned.

Your committee, believing that the sum of $3,500 is a just and proper sum to be paid Mrs. Willard, the memorialist, for the use and occupation of her property and furniture used for hospital purposes, at Murfreesborough, Tennessee, report back to the House the petition and papers with the accompanying bill appropriating that amount, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HARRY E. EASTMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers.

(Objected to by Mr. HURLBUT.)

HENRY L. CLOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3380) for the relief of Henry L. Clok.

(Objected to by Mr. HURLBUT.)

A. F. & N. C. ST. JOHN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1125) for the relief of A. F. & N. C. St. John, of Virginia.

(Objected to by Mr. HURLBUT.)

MARVIN H. AMESBURY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of Marvin H. Amesbury.

(Objected to by Mr. HURLBUT.)

CORA A. SLOCOMB, IDA A. RICHARDSON, AND CAROLINE URQUHART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3434) for the relief of Cora A. Slocomb, Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline Urquhart.

(Objected to by Mr. HOLMAN.)

J. T. M'GINNISS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of J. T. McGinniss, captain of Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army.

The bill, which was read, provides that J. T. McGinniss, captain of the Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army, is hereby relieved from the responsibility of commissary funds, amounting to $380.79, the property of the United States, which were stolen from an office safe in a tent at Fort Shaw, Montana Territory, in October, 1877.

The report was read, as follows:

On or about the 29th of September, 1867, a small iron office-safe belonging to the Government, for which Captain N. S. Constable, acting quartermaster United States Army, was responsible, was stolen from the headquarters at Fort Shaw, Montana Territory.

A board of examiners, consisting of three Army officers, was convened by Special Orders No. 93 at Fort Shaw, October 9, 1867, to inquire into and report upon the loss of said safe and its contents.

The board found that the safe had been taken by a person or persons unknown to the responsible parties or to the board.

The examiners also found as follows:

"In said safe was $380.79, subsistence funds, for which First Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss, assistant quartermaster Thirteenth Infantry, acting commissary of subsistence at Fort Shaw, Montana, is responsible.

"In said safe was $798.51 regimental funds of the Thirteenth Infantry, and $294.93 post funds; also, $27.14, regimental band Thirteenth Infantry, and $300 private money, for which First Lieutenant Thomas J. Lloyd, adjutant Thirteenth Infantry and post, is responsible."

The board of examiners further found that the safe had been turned over to Lieutenant McGinniss a few days previous to the theft; that a clerk slept in the office; that the safe was kept by McGinniss in the same manner it had been kept by his predecessor, and that it had probably been stolen by deserters from the Army.

The following certificate of Lieutenant J. B. Guthrie, of the Thirteenth Infantry, fully presents the case, and shows that the loss was not the result of any negligence of McGinniss:

LIEUTENANT GUTHRIE'S STATEMENT.

I hereby certify that on or about the 20th day of September, 1867, I transferred to date, August 31, 1867, to Captain N. S. Constable, assistant quartermaster United States Army, a small office safe, (iron.) I retained the keys of the safe for the time being, and on the 27th of September I transferred them, (the keys,) together with what subsistence funds I was responsible for, $380 97, to First Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss, regimental quartermaster Thirteenth Infantry, who was ordered to relieve of duties in the subdepartment at this place. On the 30th of September I received from Brevet Major-General John W. Turner, commissary of subsistence at Saint Louis, Missouri, the sum of $10,000, which I transferred to Lieutenant J. T. McGinniss on the 1st day of October. On receiving this money Lieutenant McGinniss first discovered the safe had been stolen from the office. Search was immediately instituted, but without success. I know this safe contained a large amount of money, part of which was the amount I transferred to Lieutenant McGinniss a few days previous, and part of which money in the safe was deposited by Lieutenant Lloyd, regimental adjutant. Lieutenant McGinniss was not responsible either for the safe or its loss and contents. The safe had always remained in the office, and no danger was apprehended of its being stolen. The exact amount of subsistence funds lost I cannot state.

J. B. GUTHRIE,
Second Lieutenant Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. A.

The committee therefore recommend that H. R No. 2257 be amended as follows: Strike out the words "$56," in the sixth line, and insert the words "$80.79," and that the bill, thus amended, be passed.

The amendment of the Committee of Claims was to strike out "$356" and insert "$380.79."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRY E. EASTMAN.

Mr. HURLBUT. I made objection to the bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers.

Since then I have examined the papers carefully and now withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further objection the bill will be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read, so we may know what it is. Repeatedly I have discovered after adjournment that a wrong impression had been created in the withdrawal of objection. A rule ought to be adopted that when objection is withdrawn the bill should be again read, so there may be no mistake.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Harry E. Eastman, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, the sum of $639.08 out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same being in full satisfaction of his claim for pay as lieutenant-colonel of the Second Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. A. E. HALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No.

2501) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of Dr. David A. Hall.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I object.

EDWIN EBERT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 940) for the relief of Edwin Ebert.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, or cause to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $110, to Edwin Ebert, late a contract surgeon in the United States Army, as compensation for a horse, the property of said Ebert, lost in the service of the United States, at Springfield, Missouri, January 8, 1863.

The report was read, as follows:

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Edwin Ebert $110, as compensation for a horse which he lost in the United States service at the battle of Springfield, Missouri, January 8, 1863. Dr. Ebert was a contract physician at the time his horse was lost. At the battle of Springfield, Missouri, it was found necessary that he should be mounted to enable him to go from one part of the field to another, directing the movements of the ambulances and gathering up the wounded. While engaged in this duty his horse was shot from under him and killed. The claim was shortly afterward filed in the Third Auditor's Office, under the act of March 30, 1849, as a claim for a horse "lost in the military service of the United States," and was rejected in 1865, on the ground that Dr. Ebert was in the service by contract only, and therefore not entitled to be mounted on a private horse. The committee think, however, that, as Dr Ebert was performing field duty at the time, which required him to be mounted, and the horse having been killed in the line of duty, he is fairly entitled to compensation for it. The facts are shown by a certificate of S. H. Welcher, post-surgeon at Springfield, Missouri, and medical director of the post, given shortly after the loss occurred, and an affidavit of two citizens of the town, by which Ebert's statements are fully corroborated.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, GRATIOT, MICHIGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3331) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the Protestant Episcopal church of Gratiot, Michigan, to erect and maintain a wooden church building on the Fort Gratiot military reservation, Michigan.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War, if not inconsistent with the requirements of the military service, to grant a permit to the Protestant Episcopal Church of Gratiot, Saint Clair County, Michigan, to erect and maintain on the Fort Gratiot military reservation a wooden building for church worship, either on the reservation proper or on that part of the same occupied by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, with the assent of said company.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "Protestant Episcopal" and insert "Presbyterian."

Mr. CONGER. Also, wherever it occurs in the title, as it was a mistake of the printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN PULFORD, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3183) to restore John Pulford, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, (retired,) to his former rank on the retired list.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and empowers the President to restore John Pulford, now lieutenant-colonel (retired) in the United States Army, to his former rank of colonel (retired) in the United States Army.

The report was read, as follows:

That section 2, above referred to, would have reduced the rank of a large number of retired officers but for the proviso of the section, which excepted from reduction in rank those officers who had been in service as commissioned officers twenty-five years at the date of their retirement, and those officers who had lost an arm or a leg, or had an arm or a leg permanently disabled by reason of resection on account of wounds, or both eyes by reason of wounds received in battle. Officers retired on the rank held by them at the time of retirement were also excepted from the operation of the act. The effect of these exceptions was to reduce the large number of those who would have otherwise lost rank to sixteen at the present time. Among this small number, however, are several quite as effectually and permanently disabled as are those who come within the exceptions of the act. The case of Lieutenant-Colonel John Pulford, referred to your committee with Executive Document No. 98, is one of these. This officer entered the service as first lieutenant of Company A, Fifth Michigan Infantry, remained in service to the end of the war, and rose to the command of a brigade with the rank of brigadier-general by brevet. He received six wounds, one as captain of a company, four as commander of a regiment, and one while commanding a brigade. Two of the severest are thus described in the report of the retiring board: First, "a wound from a spent six-pound round shot, which fractured the temporal bone of the skull, broke his collar-bone and lower jaw, causing epileptic convulsions, which wound was received at the battle of Malvern Hill, Virginia, July 1, 1862." Second, "a wound from a Minie-ball, which entered the right side of the neck and passing backward and downward carried away the spinal process of one of the upper dorsal vertebræ, and has left the spinal cord imperfectly protected, and which last-mentioned wound was received at the battle of the Wilderness, Virginia, May 5, 1864, while he was lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment Michigan Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and in actual command of said regiment."

Dr. D. O. Farrand, one of the most eminent surgeons of Detroit, Michigan, in an affidavit dated July 12, 1875, also describes the disabling effects of the wounds. He testifies that "he is personally acquainted with, and has carefully examined, the said Colonel John Pulford, and finds that his arms are permanently disabled by reason of a gun-shot wound received in battle, the ball having entered the right side of the neck, passing backward, downward, and outward, carrying away a portion of the first and second dorsal vertebræ. The wound has healed, but has left the spinal cord covered only by the integuments for the space of nearly one inch, the arms being permanently disabled by reason of the injury done to the brachial plexus."

This gallant officer was, upon a favorable report of the retiring board, retired with the full rank of colonel December 15, 1870. He was reduced to the rank of a lieutenant-colonel by the operation of the so called "Crawford act," approved March 3, 1875, and his case not falling technically (though Colonel Pulford is clearly among the most completely disabled officers of the retired list) within the exceptions of that law, he remains under the mortification and injustice of degradation from a rank fairly won by conspicuous gallantry a steady fidelity to duty, and by a permanent disability from wounds of the severest and most painful character.

Your committee, therefore, believing that this officer should be restored to his original retired rank, as a case falling within the spirit, if not the letter, of the so-called Crawford act, report the accompanying bill for his relief.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALMERON E. CALKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 559) for the relief of Almeron E. Calkins, late a second lieutenant in the Eighth Michigan Cavalry.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General of the United States Army to pay Almeron E. Calkins, late a second lieutenant in the Eighth Regiment of Michigan Cavalry, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant from the 22d day of March, 1854, to the 23d day of July, 1854, the date of his muster as such second lieutenant.

The report was read, as follows:

That the case of this officer, in the opinion of your committee, comes within the rules and decisions of the War Department respecting the terms and conditions precedent to a muster into the volunteer service during the war. He was commissioned and in possession of his commission from the 19th day of March, 1864, and, by order of Lieutenant-Colonel B. H. Hill, superintendent of volunteer recruiting service, dated Detroit, Michigan, March 22, 1864, entered upon the duties of a commissioned officer on that day. This order is as follows:

[Orders No. 42.]

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT VOLUNTEER RECRUITING SERVICE,
Detroit, Michigan, March 22, 1864.

Lieutenant A. E. Calkins, Eighth Michigan Cavalry, will proceed without delay in charge of a detachment of recruits for the Army of the Ohio, after which he will join his regiment.

The Quartermaster's Department will furnish transportation.

By order of Lieutenant-Colonel B. H. Hill, superintendent volunteer recruiting service.

JOHN H. KNIGHT,
Captain Eighteenth United States Infantry, in charge of office.

It is in evidence that Lieutenant Calkins joined his regiment on or about the 27th of March, 1864, at Mount Sterling, Kentucky, and was assigned and mustered into Company K, which muster was soon after found to be illegal, and was canceled. He was subsequently sent to Company I, which was entitled to a second lieutenant by reason of legal numbers and a vacancy; but before muster he was sent to Company K again, which company was without a commissioned officer present for duty, and to which most of the recruits brought by him had been assigned. He commanded this company on the Atlanta campaign and subsequently.

That, on account of active service entered upon by the cavalry soon after he joined, he had no opportunity to be mustered until about the 1st of September, when he was mustered to fill a vacancy in Company K, which occurred July 23, 1864.

Your committee are of opinion that this officer, who was commissioned for no particular company, should have been mustered, upon joining his regiment, into any vacancy of second lieutenant in said regiment, to date from March 22, 1864, the date of his entering upon duty as a commissioned officer. It appears from the records of the regiment that Company I had the requisite number and a vacancy of second lieutenant at the time of his reporting for duty. It seems, therefore, to have been owing to the frequent shifting command of this regiment from the colonel to the major that this duty was not attended to, and from no fault or neglect on the part of Lieutenant Calkins, who simply obeyed the orders of his superior officers.

The hardship is greater in this case from the fact that Lieutenant Calkins, who had previously belonged to an infantry regiment, was recruiting from about the 1st of January, 1864, and had enrolled over fifty men for this regiment before he was appointed from civil life a second lieutenant. For nearly seven months, therefore, so far as the evidence shows, he was without the pay of an enlisted man even, though doing the duty of a commander of a company, and really entitled to extra pay for care and responsibility of arms and accouterments during nearly four months of that time.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out in the seventh line the word "nineteenth" and inserting "twenty-second."

The amendment of the committee was to strike out "nineteenth" and insert "twenty-second;" so it will read "twenty-second day of March."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. A. E. HALL.

Mr. CATE. I call up again a bill (H. R. No. 2501) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of Dr. David A. Hall.

Mr. BRIGHT. I must object that this is not in regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was not exactly objected to, but, there being no report in the case and the reading of the report being demanded, it was passed over.

Mr. HOLMAN. I objected to the bill as there was no report accompanying it.

Mr. CATE. There is a report, and I ask to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have seen the report since I made the objection, and I now withdraw my objection and ask that the bill be again read.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the commissioners of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia to pay, out of moneys in their hands, to the legal representatives of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of David A. Hall, deceased, the sum of $1,955, being the amount found to be due the estate of said David A. Hall by the accounting officers of said District, pursuant to the opinion of the attorney of said District in relation to the liability of said District to said estate for taxes collected and illegally detained from said deceased, and interest thereon.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred House bill No. 2561, a bill for the relief of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of Dr. David Hall, submit the following report, and recommend the passage of the bill:

Prior to 1798, one James Greenleaf conveyed certain real estate in this District to Robert Morris and his associates, who conveyed the same to the United States.

Greenleaf claimed that his conveyance to the United States did not divest him of the title, and conveyed the same to Dr. David Hall, husband of the claimant.

In 1813 the United States filed a bill in chancery to perfect its title; but the case was not decided until 1857, and then the title of the United States was confirmed.

In the mean time the property has been assessed to Greenleaf and those claiming under him. David A. Hall paid the taxes so assessed during such litigation, and took certificates of such payment entitling him to a tax deed of the premises at the expiration of a certain time unless redeemed.

The premises were not redeemed, and at the expiration of the time limited for that purpose Hall applied for a deed or the refunding of the money, both of which were refused.

The matter has been referred to the attorney for the District, who reported in favor of allowing the claim at $1,931.82, and the same was audited and allowed by the late auditors in accordance with such opinion, but failed in getting the approval of the sinking-fund commissioners.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN RENTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3484) for the relief of John Rentz.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to correct the military record of John Rentz, late of the Fourth Regiment Michigan Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of the 14th day of February, 1866, and the Secretary of the Treasury to allow and pay to said John Rentz, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, all arrears of pay and bounty to which he would have been entitled if he had been honorably discharged on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1866.

The report was read, as follows:

That the "statement of service" from the Adjutant-General's Office shows that John Rentz was enrolled in Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, on the 20th of June, 1861, to serve for three years or during the war, and re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer December 29, 1863, and that he was reported "deserted at San Antonio, Texas, February 14, 1866." The war record shows no charge of dereliction of duty during this long service of four years and eight months. On the other hand, the major of his regiment and the captain of his company bear testimony to his gallantry and good conduct; and the surgeon of the regiment, the adjutant, and ten other officers, and several privates of his regiment, with several officers of other regiments, join in a certificate that "he was always on duty and never shrank from the faithful performance thereof." They further state that, "after the war was over and an order had been issued to have the veteran detachment discharged, he came home without leave, and was marked as a deserter."

In consideration of the well-established fidelity and gallantry of this soldier for the period of four years and eight months, extending to a date nearly one year after the virtual closing of the war, and after his contract of service with the Government was really completed, your committee are of opinion that a strong case is presented for the just clemency of Congress.

Your committee report back a substitute for House bill No. 303, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAPTAIN SAMUEL ADAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3489) for the relief of Captain Samuel Adams.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Captain Samuel Adams the sum of $3,750, in full satisfaction of his claim or claims against the United States for all services, losses sustained, and moneys expended by him in exploring the Colorado, the Blue and Grand Rivers of the West and the region of country adjacent thereto, and reporting the same to the Secretary of War and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

That the claimant for many years, dating back to 1864, had been engaged in exploring the Colorado River and the region of country adjacent thereto; that his discoveries in this hitherto comparatively unknown region were such as to attract the attention of observant men, embracing members of Congress and the then Secretary of War, Hon. E. M. Stanton, at whose instance the claimant embodied the result of his explorations in a report to the Secretary of War. He also, it seems, at the request of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, gave information of value as to routes, settlements, and towns from the Colorado River to Salt Lake City, which points were, by the Commissioner, marked upon his published map. The importance of this river to navigation, and its adjacent mineral and timber resources were such, in the estimation of the Secretary of War, as to induce him to direct the claimant to return to the Pacific coast of California to accompany boats to said river, and ascend it on a tour of inspection and exploration. This was done, and the Colorado River was ascended and its navigability demonstrated for the first time for a distance of some six hundred and twenty miles. From thence he proceeded inland across the main divide of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado Territory, and organized an expedition, constructed at his own expense four boats, furnished provisions, arms, &c., and descended the Blue and Grand Rivers, exploring the region of the Grand and Green Rivers, making many discoveries valuable to science, history, and most useful to the material interests of the Government.

Among the more prominent results of these explorations and observations may be mentioned the following: The discovery of a new, safe, and fresh-water harbor below the mouth of the Colorado, named Victoria Bay, now known as "Isabella Harbor," demonstrating the navigability of the Colorado River to Callville, a distance of six hundred and twenty miles, a point far beyond where the United States engineers reported the river susceptible of navigation, thus stimulating the commerce of the river and giving access to the rich mines of coal, copper, gold, and silver lying beyond; establishing the feasibility of a railroad route for four hundred miles from Salt Lake City to the head of navigation, and giving an uninterrupted route to the Pacific Ocean without crossing the Sierra Nevada Mountains; the discovery of valuable timber suitable for various mechanical and domestic uses; the discovery of the greatest fall in the Colorado, the extent of its valleys, and the location of its agricultural lands; points of mineral wealth and evidences of extinct and existing types of advanced civilization; many of which results have been since greatly utilized by the engineers and scientists acting under the authority of the United States Government.

The descent of the Grand River, above alluded to, was attended with severe hardships, imminent perils, and serious losses to the claimant and his party, in the wreck of his boats and loss of personal property and valuable papers. The claimant, in 1871, made his report to the Secretary of War, which was submitted, with his claim for compensation, to Congress, and by Congress printed; which report is herewith submitted.

The memorialist claims $20,000 compensation for services.

The committee are satisfied, from the proofs and papers submitted, that in justice and equity the claimant deserves some compensation from the Government for his labors, hazards, and losses. The only questions which have embarrassed their consideration are, first, the existence of the authority on the part of the Secretary of War to send the claimant upon such an exploration, and the real, tangible amount to which he could lay claim as the direct result of an actual or implied contract.

That the last trip of claimant to the Pacific coast, and up the Colorado, and over the mountains, and down the Blue and Grand Rivers, was made under the license and direction of the Secretary of War is satisfactorily established; that the claimant was to receive a compensation is also apparent. That the Secretary of War expected this compensation, so far as the navigation of the Colorado River was concerned, to come out of the appropriations for the coast and harbor surveys, &c., is clearly inferable; but as subsequent examination shows that this appropriation could not be so applied, no fund was at the command of the War Department for such compensation. And a misunderstanding seems to have sprung up between the Secretary of War, as well as a jealousy or criticism on the part of the Government engineers, which, coupled with the loss and displacement of papers constituting important links in the chain of evidence, only recently supplied, have delayed any favorable or final action on this claim to this date.

The claim for $700 for services and outlays of claimant in 1863 and 1864 cannot be allowed, as they were rendered and made prior to any pretense of authority from the Secretary of War. So of the item of $1,465 for liabilities incurred in running the steamer Esmeralda up and down the Colorado in 1865 and 1866. So of the item of $250 for going from Callville to Salt Lake City and San Francisco in 1865.

The item of $300 in going from San Francisco to Callville, building rafts for arms and provisions, and descending the river four hundred miles, is rejected for the same reason; likewise the following items: $450 for traveling from Callville to Washington City and reporting the facts in 1866; $160, personal expenses while in Washington City making out reports, &c.

Subsequent to this time, as the further services of the claimant seem to have been prosecuted under the sanction of the Secretary of War, and as the Government and public were manifestly benefited by the labor, hazards, and outlays of the claimant, it seems but right and just that a reasonable compensation should be allowed him. While, in the judgment of your committee, the great benefits resulting to the Government might outweigh any small computation, yet, in appropriating the public money, they feel no license to enter the uncertain field of speculation or extravagance; and reducing the claim to actual direct compensation on the basis of a contract and the extent of service performed and money expended, the committee present the following account as nearly just and reliable as is attainable:

For returning from Washington City to Colorado River, via San Francisco, to prosecute the explorations	$250 00
For expenses and services in ascending the Colorado River, seven hundred miles, crossing to Salt Lake City and the mountains, building four boats, purchasing arms and ammunition, instruments, and provisions, organizing the force, and the voyage down the river, and loss of property, and report of exploration, &c., to the Government	3,500 00
Making in all	3,750 00

For which amount your committee herewith report a bill making the necessary appropriation and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

S. E. GARLAND AND F. M. HOPPIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 515) for the relief of Sarah E. Garland and Frank M. Hoppin, with an amendment by the Committee of Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Austin M. Garland, for the use and benefit of Sarah E. Garland and Frank M. Hoppin, the sum of $337.82, together with interest thereon, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 2d day of May, 1868, until the passage of this act, being the amount of succession tax erroneously paid by them to the collector of the eighth district of Illinois at the date aforesaid.

The amendment of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

After "$337.82" strike out "together with interest thereon, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 2d day of May, 1868, until the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

E. B. M'PHERSON, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2905) for the relief of E. B. McPherson, jr., of Boonville, Missouri.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Captain E. B. McPherson, jr., of Boonville, Missouri, the sum of $563.12, in full satisfaction of the balance due him for use and time of the steamer Lexington, employed in transporting Government troops and supplies on the Upper Missouri River, from Fort Sully and return to same place, June 18 to June 20, 1865, two days thirteen and a half hours.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

BENJAMIN L. CORNISH.

Mr. FORT. I ask that I may be permitted to withdraw my objection to the bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Paymaster-General of the United States Army be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money appropriated or hereafter to be appropriated for the payment of the Army, to Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant in the Thirty-second Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 11th day of November, 1864, to the 12th day of June, 1865, during which time he actually performed duty and was regularly commissioned as such second lieutenant, but was not mustered in: Provided, That whatever amount, if any, shall have been paid to the said Benjamin L. Cornish for his services in the Army during the time above specified shall be deducted from the amount of the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant, and the balance only paid to him.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the committee rise that the House may consider a bill received from the Senate in regard to the continuation of the public printing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will rise at any rate. It is now getting late.

The motion of Mr. SINGLETON was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report with favorable recommendations sundry bills, some with and some without amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that an order be made that the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be engrossed and read a third time and passed.

Mr. RANDALL. Let them be passed one by one. There is no occasion for this unusual haste.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the motion.

CONTINUATION OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing. I desire to say that although the bill has not been referred formally to the Committee on Appropriations we have had it under consideration, and I am instructed to recommend its passage, with an amendment striking out "sixty" and inserting "ten" days.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Congressional Printer to continue the work required by law in advance of appropriations to be hereafter made, and provides that the act shall continue in force for sixty days.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend by striking out "sixty" and inserting "ten."

Mr. CASWELL. I beg to inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi if this is a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. SINGLETON. So far as I have seen the committee they all agree to it. It has not been formally referred to the committee. If we waited for that the Senate might adjourn, and twelve o'clock would arrive without any provision being made for the public printing, and to-morrow there will be no CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CASWELL. It seems that the committee have not had the matter under consideration formally.

Mr. HOLMAN. Most of the members of the Committee on Appropriations are in the House and were consulted.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me, I desire to say that it seems to me that ten days is a short time. If we pass a bill of this character it should be for a longer period than ten days. I do not know but sixty days is too long. I think the amendment proposing ten days proposes a period too short for the object in view. I would suggest twenty days.

Mr. SINGLETON. We are putting it upon precisely the same ground as the bill passed this morning with regard to other appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FURLOUGH OF EMPLOYÉS OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire now to make a privileged motion. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) granting a furlough to employés of the Government Printing Office.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution grants to employés in the Government Printing Office a furlough of twenty days, without loss of wages, that they may have an opportunity to attend the centennial exhibition.

Mr. SINGLETON. I send to the desk to be read a memorial of the employés of the Government Printing Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

A petition from the employés of the Government Printing Office, asking Congress for twenty days' leave of absence with pay, &c.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the employés of the Government Printing Office, hereby petition Congress for twenty days' leave of absence with pay, the time to be allowed whenever the Congressional Printer may, in his judgment deem it compatible with the public interests, and the number of employés to be furloughed at one time being placed at his discretion.

Clerks in departmental employ receive thirty days' leave with pay, each year. We are not so favored. Time lost by us, under any circumstance, even an hour, is deducted from our wages. While we feel that this discrimination against us as mechanics should not exist in view of the nature of our services, we do not ask for the regular yearly leave of absence. We have labored faithfully for the Government, the very nature of our employment being a heavy drain upon the vital forces; and we pray the granting of this petition as a boon that should not be withheld in the centennial year of our Republic's existence.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is a fact well known to members of the House that in every other Department of the Government the employés have thirty days' leave of absence during the year, while the employés in the Printing Office do not have a day. Not only that, but, as stated in their memorial, if they lose one hour it is deducted from their wages. This joint resolution proposes to give them twenty days' leave of absence at such time as the Public Printer may deem proper. I believe this is right. We take time for ourselves to visit this exhibition, and our salary is continued. I believe we ought to grant the same privilege to the employés of the Government Printing Office, provided it does not retard the public printing.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that I am very much gratified at this exhibition of liberality on his part. I wish to remind him, however, that he is mistaken in one thing; all the employés in the other Departments are not entitled to thirty days' furlough during the year. The laborers, watchmen, and messengers now in the Departments do not have thirty days' furlough. I suggest to the gentleman that he should include them, and also the soldiers and sailors who are not allowed any time.

Mr. SINGLETON. Offer your amendment, and I will not object to it.

Mr. BANKS. I have an amendment which I will offer if the gentleman will allow me. I do not object to the joint resolution which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has reported. I am willing to vote for it; but I think there are some others that should be included. I therefore move to amend by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that a furlough of five days without reduction of pay be allowed to the employés of the other Executive Departments for attendance at the centennial exposition, at such time as in the judgment of the chief officers of said Departments it may be done without detriment to the public service.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five days" and inserting "ten days."

Mr. BANKS. I did not intend to indicate any particular number of days, but to leave the number blank to be filled by the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I propose this amendment as a matter of public interest, not merely as a favor to the persons engaged in the different Departments, nor as a matter of sentiment or feeling on our part. The centennial exhibition is certainly one of the most successful exhibitions of industry that has ever been attempted by any nation. We have done the best we could under the circumstances, not all that we should have done, but the best we could, in order to bring about an exhibition of the capacities of the people of the United States at this time. It is a matter of great importance to the country as a means of instruction that the people of all sections of the country should visit this exhibition. Other governments having such exhibitions have given to their employés and so far as possible to the common people an opportunity to visit the exhibitions without charge and without cost to themselves.

Now, inasmuch as there are several thousand people employed by the Government in the vicinity of Philadelphia, where the exhibition is held, people who are not overpaid, who are in many instances persons of great intelligence, and who will be benefited by a study of the exhibition at Philadelphia, I think we ought to give them at least five days' time in which to make such a visit. I do not believe the people of the country will object to it or that it will be at all detrimental to the interests of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that the amendment might be amended by inserting the words "and other employés of the Government" after the words relating to the employés of the Departments here. I do not think it exactly right to discriminate in favor of those who are right here around us in this city and who are able to ask this favor of us. This resolution, if passed at all, should apply to all persons in the employment of the United States generally.

Mr. BANKS. I will agree to that. I meant to include all employés of the Government.

Mr. KASSON. It seems to me that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] would do well to include in one resolution the persons to whom he refers as well as those embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and give the same length of time to all employés of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] seems to have some weight in it; that is, that the employés of the Executive Departments, according to established custom, already have allowed them a vacation of thirty days each during the year.

Mr. KASSON. Then, why not say that all officers and employés of the several Departments of the Government who under existing regulations are not entitled to thirty days' leave of absence during the year shall hereafter be entitled to so many days for the purpose named?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. KASSON. Under regulations to be prescribed by the heads of the respective Departments.

Mr. RANDALL. The clerks in the various Departments, who now take thirty days' leave of absence under the law, have a right to do so in order to go to and return from their several homes. The time proposed to be allowed by this resolution in order to visit the centennial exhibition would be accounted as a part of their thirty days and would break in upon their usual leave of absence to that extent. I desire to give them five days' leave of absence in addition to their usual thirty days.

Mr. KASSON. I will not object to that. My object is merely to make it uniform in its application as to time and privileges.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us make it uniform throughout the country so far as regards the employés of the Government, and not let it affect the ordinary vacation or furlough to which the clerks in the Departments are now entitled by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Iowa to reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. SINGLETON. The only object I had in view was to carry out the request contained in the memorial of the employés of the Government Printing Office. They have asked for twenty days; and I have felt that we ought to give it to them. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not interfere at all with the thirty days' leave which is already accorded to employés in the Departments; it is a gratuity upon our part in the form of an additional five days which they may use now if they choose for the purpose of visiting the centennial, as I suppose most persons would like to do on the Fourth of July.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest to the gentleman that there are in the Executive Departments many persons who are employed, as are those in the Engraving and Printing Bureau, on daily wages, and whose pay is not equal to that of those for whom it is proposed to provide.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And who receive no furloughs.

Mr. KASSON. And who receive no furloughs. My object is to do equal justice in this particular, and to make the time allowed long enough to enable artisans and others to attend the Centennial and see the exhibition fully; and this privilege should be given in such a way that their accumulated wages may pay their expenses to Philadelphia and back. That is the object I have in view.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that if we send these employés of the Government Printing Office off for twenty days we shall have nobody here to do the printing.

Mr. KASSON. Of course this leave is to be taken subject to regulations to be made by the heads of the respective Departments as to the time when the different employés shall go, because they cannot all go at once.

Mr. WHITE. I move to refer this whole subject-matter to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, that they may perfect the proposition. There seems to be such diversity of opinion that I think it will be impossible for us to reach an agreement in the House.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that will not be done Although there seems to be some want of uniformity in the views of different gentlemen, it will be found that the proposition as it stands is perfectly practicable, considering the purposes in view. The printers and binders are now allowed no furlough, and they have asked for twenty days. The House seems disposed to give it to them. There are other employés of the Government who are now allowed, I understand, a furlough of thirty days at different seasons of the year to visit their homes. We desire to give to these persons five days more for a specific purpose: for the public benefit as well as their own.

Why should not the proposition be allowed to pass without being encumbered with other matters? Why should the gentleman from Iowa embarrass the question by a proposition in regard to the furlough to those engaged in the Printing and Engraving Bureau, a matter which can be arranged at another time and in another proposition? Do not entangle it with this question. We cannot make this matter entirely uniform.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] allow me to offer a suggestion? There are some employés who receive annual salaries and others who receive so much per day. Now, I submit to the gentleman whether a difficulty will not arise in regard to which of the employés of the Government here and elsewhere will be entitled to these five or ten days?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; that is included in the amendment I offered.

Mr. WHITE. I think this question can be settled in committee much better than in the House.

Mr. BANKS. If a person to whom this five days' leave is granted is employed by contract, he will not suffer any deduction of pay; but for his absence the average amount of his pay will be allowed him. That is as near as we can come to it by any amendment. I hope gentlemen will allow this resolution to pass, and afterward I will cheerfully vote for any supplementary proposition which they may introduce.

Mr. KASSON. If the resolution be recommitted with leave to report at any time, I think this matter can be adjusted in a few moments. I wish simply to arrive at what is right.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. SINGLETON. In regard to the proposition to refer this matter to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, I will say that it came from that committee this morning and on their motion was referred to the Committee on Printing. To knock this matter about backward and forward from one committee to another seems to me to be occupying unnecessarily the time of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that one week instead of ten days be the time specified; because a week will be broken into and lost at any rate. Let these employés have a week.

Mr. BANKS. That is very fair. I modify my amendment by substituting one week for five days.

Mr. FOSTER. It is evident that this matter ought to be referred to a committee to put it into proper and intelligible shape. I would suggest a special committee.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would like to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] yield for that purpose?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; I decline to yield.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Allow it to be read.

Mr. SINGLETON. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] granting one week instead of five days. I now move the previous question.

Mr. WHITE. I submit that one week will be insufficient.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. I want to know whether it is not in order now to vote on my motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the resolution, as it has been modified, will be read.

The resolution, as modified, was read.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the title by adding the words "and others."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask a question for information.

Mr. BRIGHT. I demand the regular order of business.

BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the consideration of the report from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and the Clerk will read the titles of the bills, and they will be considered, if there be no objection, as ordered to be engrossed, and being engrossed, read a third time in the case of House bills, and as ordered to a third reading and read the third time in the case of Senate bills, and that the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House as concurred in and the bills passed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read the titles of the bills, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3114) for the relief of William Gemmill;

A bill (H. R. No. 3367) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Alfred Rouland;

A bill (H. R. No. 515) for the relief of Sarah E. Garland and Frank M. Hoppin.

SUSAN E. WILLARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is next on the engrossment, third reading, and passage of a bill (H. R. No. 3373) for the relief of Susan E. Willard, widow of Sylvester D. Willard, of New York.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I should like to hear the gentleman who reported that bill from the Committee on War Claims state why the subject-matter could not be considered by the Court of Claims, and why it is a proper case to be brought here for the consideration of Congress? I move it be recommitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the bill was reported from the Committee on War Claims by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS.]

Mr. CONGER. I was one of the subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims which examined that case and reported favorably upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading, engrossment, and passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. This bill was reported favorably by the gentleman from New York from the Committee on War Claims after careful examination. The report in the case was read in Committee of the Whole House, and no objection was made to the reporting of the bill with the recommendation that it do pass. I think that report upon its face shows all the reasons why this claim has not been enforced in any other tribunal and why it was brought here to Congress. It was reported favorably by the committee of the last Congress unanimously, I believe, in the House. It was reported at this session by the Committee on War Claims after full consultation. I know no good reason why it should not be passed. The only thing wrong about it is that the amount is less really than in my judgment should be allowed; but I acquiesced in that to meet the views of the other gentlemen of the committee.

These claimants were minors during part of this time, having no knowledge of the mode of procedure necessary to secure their claim. They were living in the North, away from the scene of action. They did not know there was any tribunal to which this claim could be presented until it was too late to make the presentation before the Court of Claims. Does the gentleman know of any good reason in justice or equity why this should not be passed?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notified the House that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUSAN B. WILLARD.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say, in addition, that there was a public hotel in Murphreysborough, Tennessee, and a valuable private residence, with all the furniture, bedding, and equipments, belonging to these claimants, which were taken by our officers for the purpose of establishing a general military hospital. That hotel and private residence, with all the beds, chairs, and everything which could be used for a hospital, were used for almost two years; one of them for more than a year, and the other for about a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman assume that the Court of Claims ever had jurisdiction of this class of claims?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only way in which the Court of Claims could have had control of this class of claims was by Congress conferring upon that court special jurisdiction, and that has never been done. The question is whether the Government is to assume the responsibility of paying all this class of claims in the Southern States.

Mr. CONGER. In order to prevent the recommitment of the bill I call for the previous question; but I do not wish to take the gentleman from Illinois off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

I should have no objection to passing the bill if it had peculiar equities and would establish no precedent. I do not know that this will. The gentleman from Michigan asks me if I know any reason why this bill should not pass. That is not the ground for asking that a bill shall receive the favorable consideration of this House. The question is, why should it pass? It may be all right; but there is this on the face of it: It is a claim for the occupancy of a building in a territory that was overrun a portion of the time by the Union troops and a portion of the time by the confederate troops. It was on the battle-ground of the war in a territory where damages were committed or injuries inflicted both by northern troops and southern troops. It was an occupancy of premises in a State that was, a portion of the time at least, occupied by the confederate troops and claimed as one of the Confederate States.

Now, the question arises, shall we pay for the occupancy of premises and for injury done to property in cases of that kind? If this is an exceptional case, if it will not form a precedent for the payment of claims that may arise in respect to the operations that were carried on during the war, then I have no objection. I see no objection to passing the bill upon the explanation that has been made and the report of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say to the gentleman that these premises were occupied by our troops for the purposes named after that region came within our lines, and after it was continuously within our lines, and under the control of our Government, and with the consent of the owners, that property was taken for a hospital for our wounded men from other battle-fields around. It violates no principle that I have ever heard even suggested in the Committee on War Claims in regard to damage and destruction of property as ravages of war. A military board, a board of survey, was appointed at the time by the proper officers to fix the rental of these premises. The rental fixed by that board was more even than the committee have allowed in this case.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. What time was this property occupied?

Mr. CONGER. One part of it I think for seventeen months and another I think for eleven or thirteen months.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. At what period of the year?

Mr. CONGER. After our occupation of Murfreesborough. After our continued occupation till the end of the war, it was the center of all the operations around it and was the central military hospital for all that region. The husband of this woman was at that time the surgeon-general of the State of New York, being himself in the service of the United States.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. What debarred this claim from being presented at the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. CONGER. There was no money to pay this class of claims.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But the Quartermaster's Department allowed for stores and for the rents and the occupation of premises.

Mr. CONGER. The Quartermaster's Department allowed for stores that they paid for as they went along where they had money in the military chest to pay for the stores they took.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But there are claims which have been passed on and are being passed on in the Quartermaster's Department on certificates.

Mr. CONGER. Congress by law has forbidden the payment of such claims till presented to Congress.

Mr. KASSON. Is it not time to close this conversation? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. One more question. Were the committee unanimously in favor of this bill?

Mr. CONGER. I think they were. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, were severally read by their titles, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2501) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of Dr. David A. Hall;

A bill (H. R. No. 940) for the relief of Edwin Ebert;

A bill (H. R. No. 3483) to restore John Pulford, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, (retired,) to his former rank on the retired list;

A bill (H. R. No. 3484) for the relief of John Rentz;

A bill (H. R. No. 3489) for the relief of Captain Samuel Adams; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2905) for the relief of E. B. McPherson, jr., of Boonville, Missouri.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the various votes by which the bills reported by the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar were passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. WITHERS.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books, and other matters therein contained, and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CLAIMS REPORTED FROM TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No.

2691, for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. The bill comes to the House from the Senate with sundry amendments, most of them merely verbal, such as correcting errors in names, &c.

No objection being made, the bill, with the amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COOK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a report.

Mr. COOK. I will withdraw the motion for the present.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. BANKS, from the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration, submitted the following report:

The Centennial Committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 1st day of July, they shall respectively stand adjourned until ten o'clock a. m. on Tuesday, July 4, 1876, at which hour they shall assemble respectively at Independence Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, at which time and place the two Houses shall consider a joint resolution commemorative of the centennial anniversary of the declaration of American Independence, have considered the same, and report that the condition of the public service renders it inexpedient to act thereon at this time.

Mr. BANKS. This is the unanimous report of the committee, and I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say that on Monday last, when I introduced that resolution, we all had some hope that we could so arrange the public business this week as to enable us to dedicate that much time to the observance of a centennial occasion of so much importance. I am now satisfied, and have so stated to gentlemen of the committee, that we ought not at this time to take that number of days of adjournment. I hope the report will be laid upon the table, so that, if circumstances should change hereafter, it may be within the reach of the House.

The report was received and laid on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am instructed by the same committee to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby accepts the invitation of the United States centennial commission to attend the one hundredth anniversary of the declaration of Independence, in Independence Square, Philadelphia, on July 4, at ten o'clock a. m.; and that the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate to the president of said commission a copy of this resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will state briefly the difference between this resolution and the joint resolution just reported upon. This resolution is in response to an official invitation from the centennial commission to this House to participate in a programme which they have arranged and which they control. The other resolution was a proposition from ourselves, inviting ourselves to meet in Independence Hall, over which we have no control or authority, and which will probably be otherwise occupied. Hence the committee reported adversely upon that proposition, and have reported this resolution, so that the House can in accordance with common courtesy manifest its acceptance of the invitation we have received.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has considered the further question of the propriety of an observance here by Congress of this centennial anniversary? If Congress will go to Philadelphia and participate there in the observance of that day in some form so that it will appear upon our record that we have noticed it, I should be extremely glad. But unless we adjourn before Monday, and over Monday until Tuesday, it will be a mere sham, so far as the presence of Congress in Philadelphia is concerned, to accept this invitation. As between such a formal acceptance, not to be executed, and a meeting in our own Hall, where a simple and brief memorial service may be had, I greatly prefer the latter. I think it worthy of consideration by this House whether, if we cannot adjourn over Monday, and must meet here on Monday for the transaction of business, we will not have our own memorial service, with a proper prayer and proper resolution to be adopted, in our own Hall on the Fourth of July.

Mr. HOPKINS. In response to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I will say that I concur very fully and cordially in his idea of the propriety of a formal meeting of Congress in Philadelphia. But the gentleman is mistaken in calling it our own Hall; we have no control over it.

Mr. KASSON. I spoke of our Hall here.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not distinctly understand him. As to the matter of adjournment, the committee deemed that that subject belonged to the Committee on Appropriations, and we supposed that the passage of this resolution would be followed by one from that committee agreeing to adjourn from to-morrow until Wednesday next.

Mr. KASSON. I think the other resolution should precede this, in order that we may take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ask gentlemen and the House a question, whether it would not be more appropriate for us to sit here and serve our constituents by doing the business of the country on the Fourth of July rather than taking any more holidays? I think we have had enough holidays this year. The people will sustain us if instead of going to Philadelphia we remain here and celebrate the Fourth of July by discharging our duty to our constituents.

Mr. HOPKINS. The question of adjournment is not now before the House. The simple question is, shall we, or not, accept the invitation of the Centennial Commission?

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] It seems to me that the only becoming celebration of the day by this House is that we meet in our own Hall for a solemn service: the reading of God's Word and the offering of thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God. I think that would be a becoming service, one worthy of this historical occasion, and the only one, it seems to me, that would befit the history of the past and our hopes of the future. I hope the suggestion will be adopted.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I would not say a word against the proposition which has been suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and seconded so eloquently and earnestly by my colleague, [Mr. SEELYE.] But we have entered upon one centennial celebration of the aniversary of American Independence; we have contributed our money to it; the executive officers of the Government will probably attend it; and it is impossible for us without further time and more thorough preparation than can now be made to have in this Hall an appropriate celebration worthy of the centennial anniversary of the independence of our country. If we undertake such a celebration in the manner now for the first time suggested, it cannot be attended with that dignity nor accompanied by that effect upon the country which should be given to it. There is neither preparation, opportunity, or time for this purpose. It is very well to say that we might have prayers and reading of the Scriptures, but something more than this, something that shall attempt, if it does not reach, an adequate exposition of our position as the first Republic of our time, a review of the past, a comprehensive and just consideration of the use we have made of our opportunities and what the world may justly expect of us in the future which now ushers upon us, will be expected and demanded. For this we are not now prepared. These gentlemen who urge it upon us should have earlier presented their views and moved.

The Centennial Commission, with the concurrence and support of all the States of the Union as well as of the General Government in both its legislative and executive departments, has determined upon a fitting celebration of this great anniversary at Philadelphia. Why should we here undertake, upon notice of only a day or two, to set up a celebration of our own in opposition and rivalry of that?

Mr. CONGER. A mere side-show.

Mr. BANKS. Yes; as the gentleman from Michigan well suggests, a "side-show." I do not think it belongs to us to do that.

Now, the national commission has sent to this House an invitation to attend the celebration at Philadelphia. It is not an official, formal, a legal attendance that they expect. I am informed by a communication from the centennial commissioners that they have distributed individual invitations. They have sent us a respectful and formal invitation; and it is proper that we should take some notice of it. We certainly cannot reject it. If we are too much occupied in the legitimate and regular business of the session we should of course say so. But if it be convenient for any considerable number of members to attend, they should have that privilege. The commission could not properly overlook the Senate and House of Representatives in the distribution of their invitations; nor can we with propriety reject them. Such gentlemen as feel at liberty to attend will undoubtedly be very glad to do so. I hope this much respect will be accorded to the commission.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman sits down, will he do something to relieve us somewhat of the embarrassment of the situation? If, after having accepted this invitation, the House should continue in session here and its record should show it to be in session, we would be in the position of having accepted an invitation as a guest and then failing to be present at the entertainment.

Mr. BANKS. I will answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa by stating my own purpose in this matter. I desire to accept the invitation of the commission; I desire to go to Philadelphia to participate in the celebration there on the Fourth of July; to hear the orator who has been appointed as the orator of the United States, competent to speak the sentiments of the people on that occasion; to listen to the poet who has been selected as the poet of the United States, to express in his offering the sentiments of the people on that occasion. But if it shall be determined by the House that it is necessary to sit to-morrow or Monday, or Tuesday even, I shall remain here and do my duty. If, on the contrary, the gentlemen having control of the most important business of the House, the appropriation bills, should think it advisable to-morrow night to move to adjourn till Wednesday, I shall vote with them, and I hope the House may concur. If, on the other hand, they think it necessary for the public business that we shall sit on Monday, then I shall cheerfully vote with them and stay here on that day, going in the evening, if I can, to Philadelphia, to enjoy the festivities of the great anniversary that can never again recur for any of us. Certainly we shall not sit for business as a House of Representatives on the Fourth of July unless it is imperatively necessary. We cannot expect that result; and when on Monday evening we adjourn, we shall probably adjourn over the Fourth of July; and then such of us as choose can go at night to Philadelphia.

We leave the question of adjournment (for this matter was considered in the Centennial Committee) to that committee to which it properly and, under the present circumstances, exclusively belongs—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. I do not see that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts relieves us of that difficulty. If the committee has reported a proposition for such an adjournment as would enable us to meet at Philadelphia if we chose to go, I should concur with great heartiness if that can be done. But the trouble is they propose an acceptance, reserving the right after that whether they will conform to the acceptance or not. I do not like the House should place itself in that situation. If the committee would report a resolution declaring an adjournment over the Fourth of July, then I should see my way clear to accept it, and then no informality would appear of record.

Mr. BANKS. The committee considered this whole matter very carefully. The Committee on the Centennial Celebration could not properly determine the question of adjournment, not knowing what the condition of public business would be. We could not recommend an adjournment this evening or to-morrow over until Wednesday. We left that to the proper committee.

There is no embarrassment, therefore, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. If the public business is such we cannot adjourn, then we shall not adjourn. If it is in such condition that we can go, then such as can will go. There will be nothing in the record inconsistent with our position on the one side or the other.

Mr. KASSON. I think if the gentleman would add to it, "if the condition of public business shall allow," it will be all right.

Mr. BANKS. We do not want any such condition as that, because if the condition of public business will not allow it then we will not go. The acceptance of the invitation is a mere formal matter. It will not bind us, nor allow us to disregard our official duties. We are invited, and we accept. If we can attend, we shall do so; if not, it will be otherwise. But in any event, all the proprieties of the occasion will be properly observed.

Mr. RANDALL. I regret the committee reported adversely upon the proposition that Congress should adjourn, so to express it, to the city of Philadelphia, and on that day the two Houses should meet in joint convention and agree to some resolution appropriate to the occasion. I think it would have been a beautiful exhibition, one marking an event in our history, the declaration of Independence, meeting as Congress would one hundred years after that event in the same Hall of Independence from which that immortal Declaration was published. We might have had the roll called. But the committee decided otherwise.

I wish to say in the same connection that there is no difficulty about securing Independence Hall for that day. There is no one in Philadelphia having control of that hall who would not have welcomed Congress with warm hearts and open arms for that purpose.

Furthermore, as for the proposition before the House, I think we should accept the invitation. I think the legislative action now taking place between the two Houses as to the appropriation bills will to-morrow permit a resolution to adjourn from to-morrow over until Wednesday, and that will give the opportunity to every member of Congress to go to Philadelphia.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, every member of Congress is invited to go and hear the oration and the poem, and witness the other proceedings of that most interesting centennial anniversary. We can safely get back on Wednesday at half-past one o'clock. Such gentlemen as may attend can open the session of the House at twelve and run through the morning hour, when the House will be recruited to its full strength at half-past one. So I see no difficulty whatever in accepting the invitation. I believe that the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I can say, will concur in an adjournment from to-morrow evening till Wednesday.

Mr. BANKS. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, one word in reference to the proposition to hold a legal session of Congress in Philadelphia. The proposition does not come from the citizens of Philadelphia nor from the Centennial Commission. No invitation has been received from that city upon this subject. On the contrary, they have invited us to attend a national celebration to be held in Independence Square at ten o'clock, and ten o'clock on the Fourth of July was the very hour fixed in the resolution for the proposed legal assemblage of the two Houses of Congress on that day, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again called the attention of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. It would be easy to make it an hour earlier.

Mr. BANKS Therefore it was an unauthorized interference with a celebration which is in behalf of all the people of this country.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say one word, that the theory of that resolution was not that we were invited by anybody to make fitting observance of the Fourth of July, but Congress in its representative capacity deemed it proper to make its own celebration of the Fourth of July, under circumstances becoming that great centennial occasion.

Mr. BANKS. It was a proposition emanating from ourselves, a proposition directly in conflict with those national arrangements which have been in process of organization for many months, and to which the people of all nations have been invited.

There were other serious difficulties. We had no information that the Hall of Independence could be secured to us, so that the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeepers of the House and Senate could be authorized to take possession and exclude everybody except ourselves on that day. We also consulted with many gentlemen of the House, and there were very few members, so far as I know, who deemed it expedient or practicable to do it. We consulted with gentlemen interested in another body, of equal authority with our own, and the opinion there was almost unanimous, nearly every member consulted being positively against it.

We looked also at the law in regard to the sessions of Congress. We found that there were serious constitutional difficulties in regard to the two Houses of Congress sitting anywhere for any purpose except at the seat of Government, in the District of Columbia. The seat of Government is fixed here in the District of Columbia, and the House of Representatives, as one of the Houses of Congress, can sit nowhere except at the seat of government. The President, in the case of an invasion or an epidemic, or under circumstances that might make it impossible for us to meet here, has authority under the law to convene Congress at such other place as he may deem proper; but there is certainly some doubt whether we change the place of meeting for the two Houses of Congress without changing for the time being the seat of Government.

Mr. RANDALL. That is inferential.

Mr. KASSON. Could we not meet anywhere by virtue of a law or joint resolution?

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a question of order. Have I not called the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman called the previous question some time ago. All this is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I insist on the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution reported by Mr. HOPKINS from the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, the Speaker stated that in the judgment of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. WHITE. I call for a division.

Mr. BANKS. Has the gentleman from Kentucky a right to make such a call when he is not in his place?

Mr. WHITE. I am not in my own seat owing to the fact that I cannot hear anything when I am there.

The question being put, there were ayes 87.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes are evidently largely in the majority.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point that no quorum has voted. It is not right that we lose four days for the sake of this centennial celebration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HOPKINS, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WHITE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 2.

Mr. WHITE. I insist upon the point that no quorum has voted. We will lose four days if this resolution is adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nay 1, not voting 167; as follows:

Mr. PACKER. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLEY, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is adopted.

Mr. WHITE. I desire by unanimous consent to make just one remark. I do not want to insist on a call of the House at this time. My only reason for not moving that the House now adjourn is that I understand that the Committee on Appropriations have a bill that they desire acted upon now.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on Appropriations can take care of their own business.

Mr. RANDALL. We will take care of that.

Mr. WHITE. If they have no business to act on, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 3809, to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, which has come back from the Senate with sundry amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the Chair announce that the resolution reported from the Centennial Committee was adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so announced.

Mr. WHITE. Did a quorum vote on this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. That point of order is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is too late, other business having intervened.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, with the Senate amendments thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

In line 3 strike out "for such Departments;" strike out all after the word "lawful," in line 6, to and including the word "delay," in line 7; in line 8 strike out "such Departments" and insert "the Government;" and add to the bill the following:

And in case no sufficient balance remains at the conclusion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to the credit of any appropriation, the necessary amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no greater amount shall be expended under this act than such proportional sum of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as ten days' time bears to the whole of said fiscal year; and such expenditures shall be only for the necessary operations of the Government under existing laws. All sums under this act shall be charged to and deducted from the appropriations for like service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. RANDALL. The first three amendments of the Senate are merely changes in the phraseology of the House bill, and do not affect the purpose that the House had in view in passing the bill. The last amendment explains itself to the intelligence of the House. If no one desires to speak upon these amendments, I move that they be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask that the House remain in session a few minutes in order that the enrolled bills may be signed in open House as the law requires.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly a enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

WILLIAM H. POWELL AND F. A. M'DOWELL.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, as a substitute for House bill No. 327, a bill (H. R. No. 3830) for the relief of William H. Powell and F. A. McDowell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. CHARLES HAYS.

Mr. LORD. On behalf of the Judiciary Committee I ask unanimous consent that the testimony taken by that committee in the case of Hon. CHARLES HAYS, a member of this House, be printed, so that all the members may fully consider it.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KASSON. May I ask the gentleman when the report will be made?

Mr. LORD. Very soon after the testimony is printed.

Mr. KASSON. I hope it may be made promptly.

Mr. LORD. As something has been said in regard to that, I would like to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order has been made.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, from the same committee, reported back, with favorable recommendation, bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of Major D. C. Smith;

Maxwell, One hundred and ninety-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Caldendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PIPER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will not make that motion. It is quite important that action on the resolution providing for the public printing, which came to us from the Senate and which we amended, should be completed to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. That will only take five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is now late; and I move that the House take a recess till eight o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. PIPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that no business is to be done to-night except upon the bill which has been mentioned.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate, I believe, has taken a recess till seven o'clock, and if we meet at eight o'clock the bill will doubtless be ready by that time to be sent over.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] thinks it is absolutely essential that bill should be passed to-night or else the public printing will stop.

Mr. KASSON. The only point is that no other business shall be transacted.

Mr. RANDALL. No other business will be done except that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana, the mover of the motion, move the House now take a recess until eight o'clock with the understanding that no business be transacted except what pertains to that bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Either that or any other bill pending between the two Houses.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no limitation on this last day of the fiscal year on the part of the House to do what is necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be confined to what will be necessary to get together the two Houses on appropriation bills. So far as I am concerned I wish it understood that I make that motion, that nothing shall be done except what is necessary to bring together the two Houses on the appropriation bills.

Mr. KASSON. Then it must be for business.

Mr. CONGER. That means no limitation, then, and I think there should be none.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman then move that the House take a recess for the transaction of business?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be business between the two Houses touching appropriation bills.

Mr. KASSON. Let there be no limitation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then let the motion be without limit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be so put to the House.

And then (at six o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at eight o'clock p. m., the Speaker pro tempore in the chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the House take a recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

After the recess the House resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, notified the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of a bill (S. No. 435) amending section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners.

It further announced that it had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing.

It further announced that it had passed the bill (S. No. 962) to amend an act approved April 20, 1876, providing for the sale of a part of the custom-house in Rockland, Maine; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ROCKLAND CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage at this time a bill (S. No. 962) to amend an act approved April 20, 1876, providing for the sale of part of the custom-house lot at Rockland, Maine. It is only to correct a mistake in the description of the land in the bill as passed by both Houses.

The bill, which was read, provides that the act approved April 17, 1876, providing for the sale of a part of custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine, be, and the same is thereby, so amended that the strip of land therein described shall be as follows, to wit:

Beginning at the northerly corner of land of the heirs of Charles Spofford, and running thence north eight degrees, east one hundred and twenty-one and four-tenths feet to Limerock street, at the northwesterly corner of land of Oliver H. Perry, formerly ship-builder's lot; thence south thirty minutes east by land of said Perry and John T. Berry, one hundred and twenty-four feet to land of said Spofford's heirs; thence north seventy-six degrees west by land of said Spofford's heirs, eighteen and six-tenths feet to the place of beginning, containing about eleven hundred and twenty feet.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell and convey the therein-described parcel of land upon the same terms and conditions named in the act to which this is additional.

Mr. HOLMAN. The original bill was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the colleague of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] said it was his understanding the description of this land in the original bill was correct. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PLAISTED] is not in his seat. If the gentleman from Maine is himself satisfied this description is right, it is very proper perhaps this bill should be passed.

Mr. HALE. It is correct. It is a triangular piece of land, and it was described wrong. The large end there on the western side is described when it should be on the eastern side.

The bill was read a first and second time and ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. W. PARRISH.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, moved that the bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of J. W. Parrish be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee of Claims; which motion was agreed to.

JOHN N. HALL.

Mr. MCCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3833) for the relief of John N. Hall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF J. W. P. HUNTINGTON, DECEASED.

Mr. LANE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the sureties of J. W. P. Huntington, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, after which objections to its present consideration, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in the settlement of the accounts of J. W. P. Huntington, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow a credit of $10,000, Indian funds, charged to him and lost by the wreck of the steamer

Brother Jonathan, off the coast of California, on the 30th day of July, 1865; also a credit of $500, for that sum transmitted by said Huntington, on or about the 15th day of May, 1865, to William Logan, deceased, late Indian agent, in charge of the Warm Spring Indian agency in Oregon, for which no vouchers were returned before the death of the said Logan: Provided, That no credit shall be allowed for the said sums until satisfactory proof shall be made of the loss of said $10,000 by the wreck of the said steamer Brother Jonathan and of the transmission of said $500 to the said William Logan.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this a Senate bill?

Mr. LANE. Yes, sir. There is a report by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs accompanying the bill, and I ask the Clerk to read it for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

That in May, June, and July, 1865, J. W. P. Huntington was superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, and William Logan was United States Indian agent, having charge of the Warm Spring agency. C. S. Woodworth (who swears that he was chief clerk of the superintendency) states that on or about the 15th day of May, 1865, the said Huntington transferred to said Logan the sum of $500 of the fund appropriated for pay of general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Oregon; that Logan actually received the money, but that he died shortly afterward, and that no receipt was given to Huntington for the same. The affiant states further that the amount was justly and properly disbursed for the purpose for which it was appropriated. The absence of the receipt might be a suspicious circumstance, but not sufficient to discredit a witness whose relations with the parties made him personally cognizant of the transaction.

On the 10th day of June, 1865, in his capacity of superintendent of Indian affairs, Huntington drew a check for $10,000 on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, payable to said William Logan or bearer, and this check was presented at the office of said Assistant Treasurer and paid on the 20th day of the same month.

On the 28th day of July following Logan embarked with his wife on board the ill-fated steamer Brother Jonathan, bound for Portland, Oregon, and two days afterward they perished together at sea in the wreck of that vessel. During his sojourn at San Francisco Logan did not conceal the fact from his friends and intimate acquaintances that he would be the bearer of public funds to Oregon; and at the moment of departure he spoke of having considerable amounts in his possession.

In view of the foregoing facts, your committee report back the bill which was referred to them, and recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest that there is not a quorum present. I therefore make the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have a little bill here which I want to have passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to yield for any matter of reference merely.

Mr. HURLBUT. This is not a matter of reference. I desire to have the bill passed. It is a very just bill, and I am sure the gentleman from Indiana will approve it the moment he hears it read; else I should not ask the House to pass it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for any matter of reference.

Mr. HURLBUT. This is a matter not of reference, but of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the motion to adjourn is not pressed, I desire to ask the action of the House on this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have made the motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to state that there is a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined, and found duly enrolled, a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined, and found duly enrolled, a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 360) to continue the public printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] desires to be heard on the Texas border question. If so, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

THREE MONTHS' EXTRA PAY TO SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with an amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass as amended, the bill (H. R. No. 2526) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to officers and soldiers engaged in the war with Mexico the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, after which objections to its present consideration, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to officers and soldiers "engaged in the military service of the United States in the war with Mexico, and who served out the time of their engagement or were honorably discharged," the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848, in all cases upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence that said extra compensation has not been previously received.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

In line 8, after the word "discharged," insert these words: "according to the conditions and limitations contained in the act hereinafter mentioned."

Mr. RANDALL. I would like the gentleman from Illinois to make a statement which may go on record. I am not objecting to the bill, but I think a statement should be made in explanation of it.

Mr. HURLBUT. There are, as nearly as we can ascertain, about one hundred and fifty of the officers and soldiers of the Mexican war, who from some cause or other neglected in time to draw the extra three months' pay which was given by the act of 1848, and no appropriation has been made for paying them. The appropriations have all lapsed. And this is simply to authorize them to receive their pay under the limitations of the law of 1848. The amount is estimated as not exceeding in any event $40,000. But if there is any objection to the bill, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment reported by the committee was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOURTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. HUNTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back to the House with amendments, and with the recommendation that the bill do pass as amended, the bill (S. No. 769) to alter and appoint the times for holding the circuit court of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That instead of the regular terms now provided for by law the circuit court of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit shall be held as follows: That a term of the circuit court for the district of South Carolina shall be held at the city of Charleston on the first Monday in April and in Columbia on the first Monday in November in each year; and, so far as the circuit court is concerned, the State of South Carolina shall constitute but one district.

SEC. 2. That a term of the circuit court for the eastern district of North Carolina shall be held at Raleigh on the third Monday in April and November in each year.

SEC. 3. That a term of the circuit court for the western district of North Carolina shall be held at Greensborough on the first Monday of May and the second Monday of December in each year.

SEC. 4. That a term of the circuit court for the eastern district of Virginia shall be held at Richmond on the last Monday in May and the first Monday in January in each year.

SEC. 5. That a term of the circuit court for the western district of Virginia shall be held at Lynchburgh on the third Monday in January in each year, and at such places and times as the district court is now required to be held in said district.

SEC. 6. That there shall be a term of the circuit court for the district of West Virginia held at Parkersburgh on the first Monday in February in each year. But the term of the circuit court for said district to be held at Parkersburgh on the first Monday of August, 1876, shall be held at that time.

SEC. 7. That there shall be a term of the circuit court for the district of Maryland held at Baltimore on the first Monday in June and the first Monday in October in each year.

SEC. 8. That all cases now pending in the circuit courts for said district shall stand for trial at the term next ensuing after the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That all acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, between the word "year" and the word "and" insert the following words: "And at such places and times as the district court is now required to be held in said district."

Insert the same words at the end of the third line of the second section.

Insert the same words at the end of the third section.

Insert the same words at the end of the fourth section.

Insert the same words after the word "year" in the third line of the sixth section.

Insert the same words at the end of the seventh section.

The amendments of the committee were adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. SCHLEICHER.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the joint resolution reported from the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles.

Mr. SEELYE. I will ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which I think there will be no objection from any quarter.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I cannot yield. I myself hold the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

M. SEELYE. Then I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have already yielded to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.]

Mr. SEELYE. It is very desirable that this bill should pass now.

Mr. HOLMAN. How long will it take?

Mr. SEELYE. About five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will yield.

Mr. GARFIELD. We can vote down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] for the purpose he has indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I hope that will be the last business that will be interposed before the gentleman from Texas can call up his measure.

Mr. SEELYE. I will not ask for anything else. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, with a recommendation that it be now passed.

LA POINTE SUBDIVISION OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The Clerk read the bill. The preamble states that, under the provisions of the sixth section of the second article of the treaty concluded September 30, 1854, with the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, a reservation of four sections of land, known as the Red Cliff reservation, was set apart for the use of that subdivision of the La Pointe band of which Buffalo was chief; that under date of February 21, 1856, the President issued his order enlarging said reservation, and that it is desirable to make allotments of land in severalty to the Indians now residing there, in the manner contemplated by the third article of said treaty.

The bill authorizes the President to cause allotments in severalty to be made of any of the lands included within the extension of said reservation by the executive order aforesaid, in the same manner and upon the same conditions, including the issue of patents therefor, as are prescribed by the third article of said treaty.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 3834) was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SEELYE. I would explain this bill if there were any occasion for any explanation further than the bill itself gives. It has been carefully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is unanimously approved by that committee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SEELYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF TEXAS FRONTIER.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I now renew the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the joint resolution reported from the Select Committee on the Texas Border Troubles.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the Committee of the Whole will now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That, for the purpose of giving efficient protection to the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces River, in the State of Texas, from the cattle-thieves, robbers, and murderers from the Mexican side of the river, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and required to station and keep on the Rio Grande River, from the mouth of that river to the northern boundary of the State of Tamaulipas, above Laredo, two regiments of cavalry, for field service, in addition to such infantry force as may be necessary for garrison duty, and to assign recruits to said regiment, so as to fill each troop to number one hundred privates; and they shall be kept up to that strength as long as they shall be required in that service.

SEC. 2. That in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier, above described, to order the troops to cross the Rio Grande and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases, against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Chairman, until quite recently the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces in Texas has not been known or thought of throughout the United States any more than the Feejee Islands. Few have known, and it will be difficult for many to realize, that for ten years a portion of these United States has been overrun continually by invading bands of robbers from Mexico and that our people in that border country have for years been suffering all the losses and dangers to life and property incident to a state of war and invasion.

Only lately, since the distressing condition of that border country has been submitted to the consideration of this Congress and since the eyes of the nation have been drawn to it by the President in his late message, people begin to realize the alarming state of that border which for years has harassed and distressed the people of Texas.

That country, ten years ago prosperous and rapidly advancing in population and wealth, is now in sore distress. Its nutritious grasses and genial climate place it in the foremost rank among all the fine pasture lands of our western country, and the population, which almost entirely devoted its efforts and means to the raising of stock, were blessed with extraordinary success and rapidly increasing wealth. But for the last ten years the robbers have depredated upon and step by step impoverished them. A committee of the last Legislature of the State of Texas reported to the Legislature "that of the vast herds which but a few years ago covered the plains adjacent to the Mexican border, and which were such a source of profit to the thrifty and hardy herdsmen and great wealth to the State, scarce 10 per cent. remains to-day to compensate the stock-raiser for his years of labor and toil."

Captain McNally, in a report to General Potter, commanding at Brownsville, reported the following herds of cattle driven across the Rio Grande, near Brownsville, by the raiders to his own knowledge in seventeen days of November last, from the 8th to the 24th:

On the 8th of November, a herd of one hundred and twenty-five; on the 9th of November, a herd of one hundred and eighty; on the 11th of November, a herd of one hundred and fifty; on the 14th of November, a herd of one hundred and fifty; on the 17th of November, a herd of two hundred and fifty. On the 19th of November, a herd not counted crossed nine miles above Brownsville. About the 20th of November, two herds numbering five hundred; on November 24, a herd of three hundred, or between seventeen hundred and eighteen hundred head in seventeen days.

When it is remembered that this was a few months ago, after the cattle of the country had been reduced by ten years of continued robbery, and when the raids might reasonably be presumed to be checked by several fights with the raiders, an approximate idea may be derived of the almost incredible extent of this robbery.

Thus, step by step, day by day, through weary years of alternate hope and despondency, has this people, under the protection and almost under the shadow of the American flag, been despoiled by the people of our neighboring country.

The markets of all the Mexican cities and villages from Matamoras to Monterey have been supplied by the stolen cattle from Texas. The consul at Monterey stated that "the price of beef in the city was regulated by the arrival of raiding parties from the north."

Contracts for the delivery of large numbers of beef-cattle at Monterey were made and filled by the raiders, and the cattle were taken thence further into the interior of Mexico by thousands.

Cortina, the chief of the robbers, (whose history will be found in the report of the committee,) mayor of Matamoras and brigadier-general of the Mexican army, as well as practically dictator on that border, not only supplied these markets, but undertook a contract to furnish beef-cattle for the Havana market by a line of steamboats, and stocked his own numerous ranches in the interior with stolen cattle and horses. Captain McNally, whose evidence is always careful, well considered, and trustworthy, states:

I am in possession of positive information concerning animals stolen from the people of Texas and carried into Mexico. I can name ranches in that country upon which can be found 20,000 head of cattle and horses stolen from Texas, still bearing the brands of the Texan owners.

These vast robberies long ago would have exhausted all the cattle of that region, but as the whole region north of this border-land is the great cattle-ground of Texas, and settled by numerous stock-raisers, whose stock roam at large—often a hundred or two hundred miles from the ranches of the owners—the cold north storms which frequently occur in winter drive large numbers of stray cattle before them to the south and toward the Rio Grande, thus continually bringing new prey for the robbers. Still a belt of about sixty miles has been almost stripped of cattle, and the raiders now extend their raids to a hundred and sometimes as far as a hundred and fifty miles into the interior of our country.

General Ord, commanding in Texas, stated that the open country is virtually in possession of the raiders. The roads, formerly safe, are now impassable, except by large parties or under escort. The Mexican consul himself, traveling from San Antonio to Camargo, asked and obtained a military escort from General Ord. The Catholic bishop applied for a military escort on his circuit. The county judge going from one town to another needed a military escort. It is impossible to execute the laws, as fear seals the lips of witnesses and deters jurors and officers from doing their duty. When the raiders discovered, says General Ord, that a man on one rare occasion had sent information to the commander of Ringold Barracks, they murdered the man who sent and the boy who carried the message in less than a month.

When they start out on a raid they come into the country by twos and threes, exciting no attention, and they all meet at a preconcerted time at a place of rendezvous one hundred miles or more from the Rio Grande. They then "round up" a herd of cattle and start with them at a full run for the Rio Grande. Once across the river, they are safe and laugh at pursuit.

Although cattle-stealing is the first and principal incentive to the raids, they have gradually been connected with all other crimes. Stores and private houses have been robbed and burned down and the owners murdered. Travelers were robbed and murdered. Appended to the report of our committee will be found a fearful catalogue of crime.

In the report of a joint committee of the Legislature of Texas in March, 1875, it is stated—

That murders to the number of one hundred and five have been proven by the limited evidence before the committee to have been perpetrated by these bandits and Indians within the past three or four years in the section of country below Eagle Pass, and the murderers invariably sought a refuge in Mexico.

Not only robbery, but revenge and terror are the motives for murder.

While the Mexican citizens of Texas, owners of land and stock, are thoroughly identified with us in feeling and suffer from these raids as much as American citizens, there is a floating population without any local habitation always scattered through the country on the Texas side of the river, who are generally in league with the raiders, and serve them as spies and informers. They are often employed as herdsmen or laborers at the Texas ranches, where they obtain a thorough knowledge of the localities and of the chances for robbery. They are all natives of Mexico, and their entire sympathy is with the robbers. Whenever one of the citizens makes himself prominent in assisting to break up or interfere with the raids, or gives information or evidence against them, the raiders are at once informed, and the fate of the man is sealed. They proclaim that he must die, and their threats are always carried into execution unless the doomed victim saves himself by flight into a town. A reign of terror rests upon the whole population. Boldly and defiantly the raiders ride up to any rancho in the country and demand fresh horses or anything they want, and no one ever dares to refuse them. The few citizens of the Mexican towns on the south side of the river, who are honest, law-abiding men and have been born and hold the property in those places, are overawed by the numerous robbers. It is believed that their sympathies are against the robbers, but they dare not manifest them. The men in actual power share in the profits of the robbers and assist in their protection.

Long impunity and a life of comparative ease and large profits have attracted to that border all the desperate and vagabond elements of the adjoining country. They and deserters from the troops, who have occasionally been sent there by the national government have swelled their numbers, so that these robber communities constitute the ruling power of the country. Cortina, who was the great robber chief, appreciating fully that his warlike and numerous follow ers made him respected and feared in a country where civil wars have almost been the rule and peace the exception and gave him the supreme power, never hesitated to use his power for their protection. When Treviño, an alcalde or judge, dared to have two of his raiders and robbers arrested, Cortina shot and killed the alcalde with his own hand. Cortina has by stratagem been arrested and carried off from amid his followers and from the city which he ruled with the power of a pasha, by a bold officer of the national government, but the robber communities which he has built up have remained and are carrying on their nefarious pursuits. The large ill-gotton gains of the robbers, shared by the mercantile community and the officials, have demoralized the entire state of Tamaulipas. Even the national officers, as notoriously Colonel Christo, who was the military commander, and whose false cunning and treachery is shown in our report and the evidence accompanying it, have made themselves participants of the crime and its gains.

It has been stated by many writers that the native robbers of California, who played so conspicuous a figure some years ago, always assumed a patriotic and national character as against the hated invaders, the Americans and foreigners, and thereby gained the sympathy of the Mexican masses. The same is the case with our border robbers.

The country between the Nueces and Rio Grande was in former times a portion of the state of Tamaulipas, and the inhabitants of that state have never overcome the feeling that they should be its rightful owners. Cortina has never failed to rouse the hatred of the Mexican population against the "gringos," and to incite their hopes that the hated Americans would one day be driven back beyond the Nueces. When Roderick Dhu, from his barren mountain home, points out to Fitz-James the rich plains and valleys of the lowlands and expresses the bitter feeling of the conquered—

> These fertile plains, that softened vale,
> Were once the birthright of the Gael,
> The stranger came with iron hand,
> And from our fathers reft the land—

he strikes a chord which vibrates in the hearts of the Mexican people ever since the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and only too literally do their raiders carry out Roderick's threat—

> While on yon plain,
> The Saxon rears one shock of grain;
> While, of ten thousand herds, there strays,
> But one along yon river's maze,—
> The Gael, of plain and river heir,
> Shall, with strong hand, redeem his share.

God knows that they have taken their share, and their share, in their opinion, is all.

We have the evidence that the present strength of the raiders is far above what could be overcome by the ordinary means of our local defense. General Ord, in stating that the open country on our side of the river was virtually held by the raiders, says: "My force was entirely inadequate to check them or drive them out of the country." Captain McNally gives it as his opinion that five hundred of the best troops, if they would cross over and stay twenty-four hours, would never come back again. The raiders are bold and desperate men, splendidly armed with Winchester or Spencer carbines and six-shooters; they are well mounted and in large numbers, and their organization is so perfect that they will at once collect in the shortest possible time at any threatened point.

It requires a small army to meet the present emergency, and the longer decisive steps are delayed the more will the numbers and power of the raiders increase.

Had I not seen in an influential paper the remark that Texas ought to defend herself, I would not have thought it worth while to say a word on that point. No one, I thought, would for a moment maintain that Texas must defend that portion of the national boundary line which is in her limits. Single-handed and alone has Texas achieved her independence forty years ago, when the number of her people was little more than thirty thousand. True she had the sympathy of the American people and the generous help of hundreds of Americans who hastened to her aid. But would our State now ask help in open war against the same power when our people number nearly two millions?

But we do not wish for war. Protection and peace are all we ask, and we fear that acts of retaliation by our people, when goaded to despair, would bring about a war with all its horrors. Moreover, brave hearts and stout arms are not sufficient for war. We can have no army. When the republic of Texas yielded up her independence and became a State of this Union, she yielded her power to make war not only, but she yielded the means. The custom-house duties, the internal revenue, flow into the coffers of the United States and are ours no longer. We have taken up our share of the public debt, and, whatever others may think, we at least mean to pay it honestly, and in honest money, greenbacks and all. How could we provide for a military establishment besides? Out of our small means our people have year after year supported State troops to help out the protection of our Indian and Mexican border which we never with all our petitions could obtain; our people knew that the National Government owed that protection, but they never could find it in their hearts to turn a deaf ear to the appeals for help coming from their brothers on the frontier. Poor as they often were these taxes were never begrudged; for there is a strong feeling that binds Texans together growing out of a history of their own, full of common suffering and common glory.

But if the defense of our national border would be thrown upon the frontier States, what would our Army be doing in the mean time? Would it be standing guard, as has been suggested, over the valued persons of officers? This is no mockery, as might be thought. The theory that the protection of the officers was the chief duty of the Army and that the States had to defend the national border, unless indeed invasion should come in the shape of an army with banners, has been gravely advanced, as will be seen by a reference to the documents attached to our report. If we could admit the correctness of this theory, the sooner our Army would be retired the better would it be.

But it is not so. Our experience has shown that the army we had in Texas held far different views, and that from the commanding generals to the privates in the ranks they have been untiring in their efforts to give as much protection as was in their power to our scattered and exposed settlements on the frontier. Our people have marked their brave and cheerful bearing in hardships and danger, and their energy has given us such intervals of peace as our Indian frontier has lately enjoyed, and no voice from our State shall ever be heard in detraction of their well-earned fame and their brave and kindly conduct. Theirs has been no life of ease, and the least they can claim at our hands is a just appreciation of their devoted and arduous service.

Our troubles do not extend along our entire Mexican border. We are on the most friendly relations with the people and the authorities of the states of Coahuila and Chihuahua, and the raids only come from the state of Tamaulipas, where the people are demoralized or overawed by the robbers, and the authorities are chiefs of robbers or participants in their ill-gotten gains.

I am aware that not only the Mexicans have positively asserted that the raids were mutual and that robbers from Texas raided in Mexico as well as Mexican raiders in Texas, but that public opinion in the United States has been much inclined to believe it. Our report disposes fully of the slander, and the most zealous investigation shows it to be totally without foundation. Mr. Fish himself, the Secretary of State, has emphatically denied the charge to the Mexican authorities and challenged them to prove one single fact. They have not only failed to prove but even to define one solitary case. The truth is that both the reward and the danger held out to such of our roaming people who might be so inclined would be such as to make the attempt utter folly; for, while the American side of the river is rich and defenseless, the Mexican side is poor and bristling with arms, with a robber population always on the alert.

Equally untrue is the charge that our people want more of the territory of Mexico and desire to provoke a war. Never was there a greater mistake, not to say slander.

Sir, ever since the war with Mexico the frontiers of Texas have been harassed both by Indians and freebooters. The scenes of horror that have been enacted on our Indian frontier beggar description. General Sherman in his evidence before the last Congress stated that he passed on our frontier abandoned farms, remnants of fences, the blackened chimneys of burned houses, and all the evidences of former settlement, but the frontier settlers had been killed or driven back for many miles. No one who has not himself seen the terrible sights after an Indian raid, the bodies of men, women, and children mutilated in wanton sport by the devilish cruelty of these fiends without mercy, brave men tied up and burned alive at a slow fire; no one who has not heard the tales of woe from female captives of our blood and race carried off and subjected to unutterable misery, dragged naked under the burning sun with their bare feet over stony roads, tied between the horses of their pitiless captors, and then turned out into the barren wilderness to die alone, will ever know what our people have suffered.

Our Legislatures have continually petitioned this Congress for protection; our governors have sought help from the National Government for long and weary years. For near thirty years which I have lived in Texas near the Indian and Mexican frontier I do not now remember one solitary day when we had peace and a feeling of entire security on all points of our extended border; nor do I remember one single year that our people did not tax themselves to keep up what force we could to afford that protection which we in vain called for.

Our country offers unsurpassed facilities for the herdsman in raising all varieties of stock. There indeed has the Lord tempered the wind to the shorn lamb, and in the mild climate the cattle and horses find rich nourishment on our luxuriant grasses from one end of the year to the other. The wealth of our people was always in their herds and flocks. It wearies my memory to think of the number of cases where the fruit of long years of toil was swept away in an evil hour and of the men who went to rest at night prosperous and in easy circumstances to find themselves paupers in their old age in the morning.

Our people have hoped for peace with that hope deferred which makes the heart sick; and shall we wish for war now? The thought is madness. We want peace; we want no more territory; we wish to see our own vast territory filled with a prosperous population.

If I shall express my own views as to the policy of this nation, I think that all the diplomatic efforts of the Government should tend to bring about a friendly intercourse with the Mexican government and people. I think that our embassy to Mexico might be made of more practical importance than any other, not excepting either England or France. We are and will forever remain neighbors, and whether our mutual relations be conducted prudently or otherwise our future history for weal or woe will never be separated. Once dispel their apprehension that we covet their land and wish the disintegration of their nation, and they will see that we are for them the most useful friends.

Once before, when the armies of France overran Mexico and the empire of Maximilian was established, the United States upheld the sinking fortunes of the liberal government of Juarez, and it was their frown which removed European influence from Mexican soil. The government of President Lerdo is the heir of the principles as well as the power of the government of Juarez, and a worthy heir, and must retain the memory of that stormy time of its history, and the memory also of those who were then the friends in need. Its enlightened policy, its determined and devoted efforts to raise the Mexican nation out of the sea of troubles on which it is tossing for so many years and lead it to a safe and bright future, have gained for the present government of Mexico the esteem and strong sympathy of the American people. Why should not our intercourse be more extended and made mutually advantageous? Why should not our people have the trade with Mexico which is now almost entirely in the hands of European nations? A proper treaty of reciprocity and a prudent and honorable policy can bring about mutual relations satisfactory and advantageous to both nations.

Again, I will say that our conduct should be just. While we must have protection for our people and enforce it if necessary, we should be careful to observe all our own obligations. The Apaches on the Chiricahua agency, which has been established in Arizona, have for some time been engaged in desolating raids into the state of Sonora, and the inhabitants of that state have suffered greatly. Care should be taken that no such inroads are permitted on our part, and that the Indians are forced to remain on their reservation or removed to one more suitable.

While these are my views of the relations which we should observe with the people and government of Mexico, I will further say that I can certainly not be charged with prejudice against the Mexican nationality. We have many Mexican citizens in Texas, and nearly all of them reside in the district which I have the honor to represent. I can say with pride that I have had the support of the great majority of them and have many evidences of their confidence. The Mexicans residing in Texas have, from the very beginning of our separate history, cast their lot with the Texans, and have been the steadfast and patriotic sons of our country. The names of many are inscribed on the pages of our history. They were represented among the signers of the Texan declaration of independence and among the members of Congress of our Republic. They were with our people in the battle of San Jacinto, where the independence of Texas was won by the sword; and ever since they have shared our fate in council or war. On the very ground where these raids occur they are numerous among the sufferers, and many have been conspicuous in the defense of our border and in the predatory war with the invading robbers. They are true American citizens. Since the first years of my residence in Texas to this day they have been my neighbors and friends. I claim to express their views like the views of all my other constituents. There is no animosity or separation of the nationalities; a common destiny has melted all elements together. When I speak of my people I speak of them as of all the rest.

I have thus fully expressed my views so as to place our motives beyond all cavil and doubt. But I insist that the protection of our frontier and the employment of all the means necessary to that end are imperative duties. One of the earliest necessities of society among all nations has been the punishment of crime by society to prevent its increase. This right and the recognition of its necessity are as old as the first elements of civilization. Withdraw the punishment and crime will increase everywhere. Now, in this case there has been a life of crime, of rapine, and murder, followed for ten years in the open light of day and in bold defiance of all law, human or divine, by a whole community. Their government, powerless to control or punish its criminals, yet sets up a claim that its territory must be respected, practically a claim for total impunity for the criminals. Our Government, upon whose citizens they depredate, while knowing the weakness of the government of Mexico, yet acknowledged that feeble claim to the sacredness of their territory, and yielded in obedience to it the sacred right and the sacred duty of self-defense. No more humiliating spectacle has ever been presented than was exhibited on the Rio Grande again and again. Here the habitual despoilers of our people, with the stolen herds coming out of the river on the Mexican side, with insulting gestures and laughter and jeers, and on the American side of a river, which they could have crossed in a few minutes, our baffled military protectors, perplexed with rage and shame, their valor and their common sense alike benumbed and paralyzed by diplomatic fictions.

It is the unanimous opinion of all military men who are familiar with the localities that no efficient defense of the border can be had without the right of pursuing the robbers when found in possession of their booty across the Rio Grande and until they are reached.

I send to the Clerk's desk extracts from the evidence of Captain McNally and General Ord, given before our committee, to be read:

The Clerk read from the testimony of Captain McNally, as follows:

These people who raid on Texas are not claimed by Mexicans as citizens of that country. They say that they are outlaws and murderers and that as far as they are able they stop their crossing, and they want us to assist them in doing so. They desire that we shall render them all the assistance in our power to break that system up. I believe that if orders were issued to our military authorities to pursue these bands to the other bank of the river and punish them so severely that the pay they got for crossing a herd of cattle would not compensate them for the risk they run in making the raid, it would be the most effectual and rapid way of breaking this thing up, without subjecting any innocent parties to harm. In carrying out that policy there is no probability that one innocent man would suffer. The government of Mexico is unable to break this thing up. If President Lerdo were to send an officer down there honest enough to act vigorously against these fellows and with a sufficient force to stop these raids, the state of Tamaulipas would be in revolution in less than three months. It is far distant from the capital. The entire federal army of Mexico has its hands full in restraining the interior states from revolting, and it would be impossible for the president to coerce this state. He has not force enough. This information I received from federal officers in Mexico, who told me that they had not troops enough to send there, and that they knew that as quickly as a squad of men were sent there for that purpose the state of Tamaulipas would revolt. Mexican officers have said to me, "I wish to God you would kill all these fellows." That I think would be the quickest and most effectual remedy for the breaking up of the cattle-thieves, for so long as these robbers find on the opposite bank of the river a place of refuge and a city where they can dispose of their plunder without danger so long will they continue to raid upon Texas. It would cost the United States Government more money to guard that border than the whole state of Tamaulipas is worth; I mean, to guard it so effectually as to prevent these men from coming over.

The Clerk also read the following from the testimony of General Ord:

After examining the country, which I found to be a dense thicket along the river, with here and there narrow paths or cattle-roads cut through, (which thicket extends sometimes twenty or twenty-five miles from the river toward the open plain,) and from the fact that the grazing country to the north is about the same distance from the river from its mouth for five hundred miles up the river, I came to the conclusion that it was impossible to guard the river-banks by a system of small posts or videttes, for the reason that the cattle-thieves can receive notice from the rural population (who are nearly all Mexicans) of the location of the troops. I satisfied myself that the only way to protect the property of the people on that frontier and to prevent these raids was to cross the river whenever the troops struck a trail with the prospect of overtaking the cattle-thieves. They cannot see them come through this thicket or chaparral, and they cannot know that they are coming on any particular road except only by accident. They can only get upon the trail in the rear and follow them, and as these cattle-thieves go mounted and at full run the prospect of overtaking them before they get to the river is more than doubtful; it is next to impossible. The local authorities on the Mexican side, being under the influence of this lawless population, which I have described, and being sometimes their leaders, are averse to restoring any property, and I believe they have never yet shown any disposition to do so, no matter how strong the proof of the guilt of the party or the evidence that the property is within their reach. These officials have frequently engaged in these cattle-raids and have boasted of the success of their enterprise. Under these circumstances, and in view of the powerlessness or inability of the Mexican government to enforce its own laws, or even to protect its own property, we cannot expect them to protect ours, and I consider it not only justifiable, but the duty of the United States authorities, to enforce the security of our own border and to protect the people from invasion.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. All declare that the power of the troops to cross after them will break up the raids very soon. The very knowledge of the existence of such power will convince them that hereafter their trade will be rather dangerous, and one or two examples will probably suffice to break up the whole organization. Observe that in the proposition presented by us the crossing is not made obligatory, but is a reserved power to be used only where all other means shall fail. Can the Mexican government object to it? They cannot formally agree to it, because the pride of their people would take offense and they would lose politically too much by making such concessions. But common sense should conclusively show that it would be the height of absurd pretense that they should demand of us not to molest their criminals while they themselves are powerless to control them. If this authority is resorted to, it will be a necessity incident to our self-defense. They cannot in reason present the alternative that we should either continue to suffer the inroads of these robbers or else incur their displeasure. As early as 1873, Mr. Fish has declared that this must be the last resort.

It has been said that the pursuit of the robbers across the border should be left to the discretion of the commanding officer, without a special authority by Congress. We have considered this proposition and could not approve it. The President has in his message submitted this matter to the consideration of Congress, and if we recognize the necessity of the action which we propose it would be unworthy of Congress and unjust to the Executive and the officers of the Army if we should escape the responsibility and place it entirely upon their shoulders. We do not propose to direct that pursuit should be made, but leave the President the judge of the necessity when it shall occur.

The revolution which has for some time been going on in Mexico on and near our border had temporarily changed the condition of things in this, that the Mexican government had entirely disappeared from the scene, and that at one time the revolutionary leaders, Porfirio Diaz and others, held possession of the entire country on our border. This has lately again changed, as the revolutionary forces have abandoned Matamoras and marched to the interior; and General Escobedo, commanding the forces of President Lerdo's government, has appeared at the head of an army and occupied Matamoras, Camargo, and other places. On his arrival at Camargo, General Escobedo sent a letter to General Ord advising him of his arrival and expressing sentiments of friendship and good-feeling on the part of his government.

The character, the high position, and the power of General Escobedo led to the belief that crime would be rigidly punished at least while he would be on our border with his army, and that he would rigidly enforce order. But it behooves this Congress to consider well what the prospects for the immediate future really are. Up to the 30th of May the accounts of robberies have continued. It is true that they have decreased both in frequency of occurrence as well as in magnitude, because the great bulk of the robber population had joined the army of Porfirio Diaz, the revolutionary leader, on his march to Monterey, and have remained in his army ever since. But the raids have never entirely ceased. On the 15th of March, Major Clendennin, commanding at Ringgold Barracks, reported to General Potter, at Brownsville:

> I think the cattle stealing has been transferred from the lower Rio Grande to the vicinity of Carigo and points above. I cannot guard the fords with thirty men. I ask to be relieved from the responsibility of command here at once. I have no troops of my own arm of service, cavalry.

He stated what he saw; but cattle raiding was going on along the lower Rio Grande as well, as we see from statements from that quarter. A fight between raiders and citizens took place on the 7th of April below Brownsville.

I will send to the Clerk's desk some reports of our papers and also the official report of Captain McNally to the adjutant-general of the State of Texas. These accounts will not only show that the raids are continually occurring, but also that in our confidence in the presence of General Escobedo and his army and the preservation of order and safety thereby we have again been grievously mistaken, as we were so many times before.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the San Antonio Herald.]

MEXICAN DEPREDATIONS.

We were pleased this morning at receiving a visit from J. C. See, of Laredo, who is at present in our city on a visit.

We learn from this gentleman that on the night of the 18th instant a party of Mexicans, from the other side of the Rio Grande, stole thirty-eight head of horses and two yoke of oxen from Mr. Slaughter's herd, in charge of Mr. George High, on the Carizo. Mr. High followed the maranders on the day following, and came upon the oxen, which had been abandoned. The pursuers, however, did not reach Presidio del Norte, on the Rio Grande, until after the thieves, with their booty, had crossed over, which is the usual upshot of all attempts to capture Mexican horse-thieves when they once have the advantage of a few hours.

Mr. See also tells us that three days ago there was a tremendous rain on the Frio, and there had been some also on the San Miguel; but none whatever between that creek and the city.

EDINBURGH, May 19, 1876.

EDITOR SENTINEL: Yesterday I acted as interpreter for Captain McNally. He sent a message for Señor Desiderio Rodrigues, president of the ayuntamiento of Reynosa, to come and see him. Señor Rodriguez came in response to the message of Captain McNally, who demanded of him the restoration of the rest of the stolen cattle—amounting to twenty-two or twenty-three head—and the surrender of the thieves that escaped, of which he gave a list, as follows: Abundo Mungia, Lino Perez, ——— Candelario, a son-in-law of Abunda Mongia, ——— Garza, Eusabio Mancias, Andres Cavazos, and one or two others.

Señor Rodriguez was greatly agitated when he first came over, and during the conference. He promised to deliver the cattle and thieves and gave his word to that effect; but, up to the time of writing, nine p. m., no cattle or thieves have been delivered.

Señor Rodriguez sent a communication to General Escobedo, informing him that the Mexican territory was invaded by Americans. Fifty men and an officer were sent to protect him.

The stolen cattle were crossed by the thieves into General Escobedo's picket lines! This is from reliable persons, and Captain McNally and Lieutenant Farnsworth, United States Army, did not hesitate in informing Señor Rodriguez of the fact.

Last evening Captain McNally had a guard stationed in front of the "Sabinito" ranch, where the thieves crossed the cattle, and where they reside and are protected by the Mexican authorities. The thieves fired across the river at the guard that night and again in the morning. Fortunately none of our boys were injured. The fire of this morning was returned, but without effect further than that a house was pretty badly riddled from the fire of our boys.

A ranger just in from the scene says that the Mexican authorities had sent a force to capture the thieves. The ranch was surrounded but the game was not to be found. They had timely warning to make themselves scarce. It is well known that the parties concerned in this cattle stealing reside at this ranch with their families and have all their interests there.

Captain McNally crossed over with three men and had a good view of the den and saw the trail of the cattle. They were driven in the direction of Reynosa. Sabinito ranch is about four miles above Reynosa. The wounded thief is in that city under medical treatment.

This is the same gang of thieves that murdered Mr. Cleaveland some time ago, and also made an attempt to murder and rob Mr. Estapa, of this county.

OJO.

SAN ANTONIO, May 30, 1876.

Yesterday Alejos Gonzales and eight of his hands followed cattle-thieves near Eagle Pass. They came up with them, thirty in number, at Comanche Creek, thirty miles east of Eagle Pass, and engaged them in fighting from nine a. m. to four p. m. The battle resulted in victory for the robbers; they killed Gonzales and four of his men. The other four escaped, and report five of the robbers killed.

Alejos Gonzales, who was recently killed by robbers near Eagle Pass, was quite a young man, and raised in San Antonio. He did quite a large mercantile business in Piedras Negras.

GRANDHAM, TEXAS, May 19, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the night of the 17th I followed a gang of raiders (numbering eight or ten) to the river, at a point five miles above Edinburgh. It was very dark—ten o'clock p. m.—and my guide missed the trail, detaining us about thirty minutes, so that by the time I reached the river they had crossed all the cattle but seven or ten head, and there were but four men on this bank, two of whom were killed, one wounded badly, and the other escaped. The firing commenced from the other side as soon as my men came in sight. For fear of accidents I had instructed my men not to fire until they were close enough to make sure shot.

We got six horses, saddles, and bridles, and their camp equipage, consisting of coffee-pots, cups, blankets, ropes, &c.

I at once wrote a note to Captain H. J. Farnsworth, Eighth United States Cavalry, stationed at Edinburgh, asking him to assist in recapturing the cattle. He came up next morning (18th) with fifty men, but refused to cross, and said that he would assist me in recrossing if he was satisfied that I would be unable to get back without his help, but would regret the necessity of so doing, and advised me not to go.

Some of my Mexican guides thought that a part of the cattle were just back of the ranch, the Sabinito; so I crossed with three men and searched the fields adjoining the ranch, but found no cattle; saw the trail leading straight to Reynosa, distant but one mile and a half, and, as Captain Farnsworth told me that General Escobedo had a large force there, I recrossed.

I then went to Edinburgh and sent for the alcalde of Reynosa; told him of the affair and asked for the return of the cattle as soon as they could be found, together with the thieves. He promised to return the cattle and arrest the thieves and have them punished. On urging a compliance with my just demand, he promised to send the thieves over secretly as he was afraid to do so publicly.

Captain Farnsworth and the sheriff of Hidalgo County assisted at the interview. Captain Farnsworth told him that he intended to support me fully in everything I saw proper to do in the matter. This evening the chief of the rural police told me that they were making a very determined effort to catch the thieves, and thought they would succeed.

General Escobedo and staff were in Captain Farnsworth's camp while these thieves were crossing the river and driving beeves inside Escobedo's lines for breakfast; and Escobedo's band of twenty pieces that he had brought to Farnsworth's camp was playing in our hearing when we commenced firing on the raiders.

I believe there is some correspondence going on between General Escobedo and the United States authorities at Fort Brown in regard to the matter.

We leave this place in the morning for Laredo and * * * .

Very respectfully,

L. H. McNALLY,
Captain commanding.

A true copy.

WM. STEELE,
Adjutant-General State of Texas.

General WILLIAM STEELE.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. But even if General Escobedo had the will and the power to restrain this robbing, we could not expect that the Mexican government could leave him and their army on that remote frontier. Already we hear that he is about leaving or has left for the interior and that the notorious Colonel Christo, who was in command during the worst part of the raids, who proved his bad faith and complicity, as fully shown in our report, is again left in command at Matamoras.

We have reports that the revolutionary army under Diaz was defeated in the interior of Mexico. If it is so, or whenever it does occur, thousands of fugitive stragglers, the débris of the defeated armies, demoralized, desperate, starved, and ragged, will be turned loose on our devoted frontier. The same people have taught us the same humiliating lessons for ten years. We know where they are; we know that for years their business has been the robbing and murdering of our people, and we can almost count the weeks and tell the day when their hungry bands, worse than so many starving wolves, worse than the devouring clouds of locusts, will again arrive on our exhausted frontier, the accustomed theater of their infamous activity.

But another unexpected change has again occurred in the last few days. Again the revolutionary army has defeated the government troops under General Quiroga on the Rio Grande, and even now they may be again in full power on our border. Cortina, the old robber chief, the old enemy of our people, has broken his parol in the city of Mexico, has escaped, and is now in high command in the armies of Porfirio Diaz. Every day may see him on the Rio Grande again, breathing vengeance and defiance at the head of thousands of his robbers. And still our border lies open and unprotected. Shall the dark clouds break upon the devoted heads of our exposed people or will you help them?

Mr. Chairman, your committee have shown the startling condition of that portion of our country by evidence as clear and undoubted as the light of day.

The facts presented to you are formidable in their long array and astonishing by the light they throw upon the condition of that country. Murder most foul and revolting, robbery on a scale so stupendous as to make the most undoubted facts appear like fiction, all committed for long years by constant invasion of our country under the very shadow of the flag of our nation, flaunting its false and delusive promises of protection to the despairing sight of our abandoned people.

We have shown that all appeals to the Mexican authorities and all hopes of redress and safety from them are vain and worse than useless; that between the duplicity of the Mexican government, induced perhaps by their weakness, and the bad faith and complicity of their local authorities, all we ever received at their hands were empty promises, always broken and never relieved by a single act of good faith. We have shown that to promise our people help and relief through the Mexican government would be a cruel mockery, and that all that remains for them to look to is solely and alone the immediate and energetic action of our nation. Will the members of the national Congress let the people on our outposts turn their eyes to them for help in vain; and have they no heart for those who are bound to them by the sacred ties of nationality, those ties which so lately were made indissoluble by your blood and your treasure?

Sixteen years ago Governor Sam Houston closed a letter to the State Department on the same subject with these words:

> Our entire means of defense now in the field is inadequate to the protection of the country from Indians, and we must depend for the protection of the Rio Grande on the nation. Believing that when the facts are presented to Congress the dictates of humanity will rise above all party or personal considerations, I yet look for aid from that quarter. The American heart must feel for a people of like race and kindred; and though sectional considerations may prevail at times they will, I believe, be forgotten when the catalogue of barbaritics, by which our frontier has been devastated, is remembered.

Sam Houston has gone to his grave, but his appeal, unheeded in the passions of those days, addresses itself again to the representatives of the nation of which he was one of the most devoted citizens.

Texas is the young giant of these United States. Born amid the storms of battle, her early days spent under the severe and sober teachings of toil and sorrow, she only now enters upon a career which will before long make her the peer of the foremost State of this Union. When these dark days shall have passed into history, when in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity her fertile plains shall bear the rich reward of the toils of the honest husbandman; when the shaded banks of her rivers and her smiling valleys shall resound with the busy hum of peaceful industry; when the teeming herds and flocks will browse undisturbed on her extended plains and her green hillsides; when she will have taken the rank among her sister States which the millions of her hardy people will assign to her, then she will bear in grateful memory the names of those who were her friends when friends were needed.

If the history of our country has taught any lesson, it is that the policy which is wisest and most successful is not the policy of heartless calculation, but that which wins directly the hearts of the people. Fear and hatred are weak bands to bind this great country permanently together. The power of deep-rooted patriotism alone is equal to the task. Love of country, that most ennobling of the virtues of man, that feeling which in all ages has made men heroes and caused them to pour out their blood like water, is the firmest foundation of States; and no wise statesmanship has ever neglected the opportunity to sow its seeds in the fertile soil of the hearts of the people, and to foster its growth by all means in its power. When the generation which will follow us in our State shall hereafter remember the dark times through which their fathers are now passing; when they remember that their mothers sat through the long and weary nights, their eyes strangers to rest, and their frightened ears hearing the yell of the merciless robber in the moaning of the night wind and in the distant howl of the prairie wolf, then let them remember also that at the time of their utmost peril their nation stretched forth its strong arm and interposed its protecting shield between them and ruin. Then their hearts and the hearts of their children and their children's children will cling to their country as with hooks of steel. Who can tell the future? Who will say that the day will not come when their blood, freely shed on some future field of battle, may maintain and save their country's honor and integrity?

Your duty to the suffering citizens of your country, and far-seeing wisdom alike, call on this Congress for magnanimous and prompt action. Not only will it save those who have a right to look to you for aid and protection, but, like bread cast upon the waters, it will return to bless the giver after many days.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the members of this body, after hearing the report of the committee who investigated this subject, and after listening to the very eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] cannot doubt that the people of the frontier of Texas have suffered perhaps beyond the power of language to express from the incursions of Indians and from the incursions of the robbers from Mexico. I have no doubt myself that it is the duty of this Government and has been for years past to endeavor by some means to prevent the larcenies, the robberies, and the murders which have marked that frontier, not as a part of the quiet, peaceful domain of the United States, but as a place for murder and rapine and inroad unchallenged and perhaps undiminished.

I would agree with the committee in this joint resolution and with the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, that it is the duty of this Congress to make some provision by which the country along the Rio Grande may be protected, by which the people there may be protected in their property, in their rights, in their lives, in the security of their habitations, in the enjoyment of all their privileges. As to the first part of the joint resolution, proposing to send an armed force there, cavalry and infantry, more or less, I would give it my hearty assent. But I am very free to say that the second section of that bill which authorizes the troops of the United States to pass beyond our borders, to go into the territory of a friendly nation, to violate the neutrality existing between this people and Mexico, seems to me a dangerous proposition and one to which I cannot give my assent, especially when I remember that the attention of the Mexican government has been called to this very subject; that that government has appointed a commission of its distinguished citizens to spend a number of months in taking testimony along the Rio Grande of witnesses on the Mexican side and on the American side of the river, inquiring apparently as fully as it was possible for them to inquire into the existence of the outrages charged and into the remedies which might be proposed.

Sir, I have read with a great deal of interest and a great deal of care the pamphlet report of that committee—a book of three or four hundred pages, embodying the abstract at least of the testimony taken by the commission at many points along the river, from distinguished Mexican citizens, and from many American citizens, in regard to these raids, in regard to who are the cattle stealers, the robbers, and the murderers. My friend from Texas has undoubtedly read that report. I have nothing to say in regard to the veracity of it. I will only remark that the Mexican government has officially, and apparently with great care and trouble, made an examination of the charges that their citizens constitute the raiders who come from Mexico across the border into Texas. The report of that commission has been rendered to the Mexican government long since; and upon the report that government has assumed that except the scattering thieves and robbers who fly first to one side of the river for safety and then to the other—mere outlaws, outlawed by Mexico and outlawed by the United States—except that class of people, there are no raiders and marauders who can be found in such force or in such locality as to be reached by the authorities of Mexico.

I say that whether the report of that commission be correct or not, and whether the conclusion of the Mexican government in this matter be a correct conclusion or not, we are at least met with the proposition that the Mexican government has taken the usual means to examine into the existence of these bands of marauders as charged by the Texan people; and it denies their existence. It denies that the Mexican government is responsible for the inroads of these individual men. More than that, (and of the truth of this I have nothing to say,) it charges that the robbers and marauders are mostly American citizens, who commit depredations upon their fellow-citizens in the United States, and when pursued flee across to Mexico for safety from the pursuit of their own Government.

Mr. Chairman, as I remarked before, I have no knowledge other than what I derive from this committee and from the remarks of my friend from Texas, in regard to the truth of the charges on our side; and I have no knowledge of the truth of the charges of the Mexican government that these robbers, these marauders, and these murderers are outlawed men—outlawed by all government, mere pirates infesting the face of the earth, and seeking a refuge now on this side of the river and then on that, pursued alike by both governments for punishment and for justice. I allude to it merely as the foundation of a remark which I wish to make respecting the second section of this bill, by which the Congress of the United States, in the face of all international law, in the face of all rules existing between two civilized governments, would incorporate into a bill passed by Congress the right at the will of the President to do such acts as are themselves declarations of war between civilized governments. The proposition is no less than that our Army shall cross the border; no less than that the military force of the United States to a greater or less extent shall pass over our border, invade Mexico, without any limitation as to the distance it may go into that republic in pursuit of marauders; the only limit, and not even that mentioned in the bill, would be pursuing them far enough into Mexico to reach them.

While I will join the gentleman from Texas in voting for any number of regiments of cavalry or of infantry that may be necessary to protect the American citizen on American soil in his rights, in his home, in his property of whatever kind, yet I should like to consider before voting upon the other proposition whether I would authorize the President of the United States to violate all the rules of international law, all the principles of neutrality, and pass over into the territory of a sister republic, pursuing marauders, cattle-stealers, or murderers wherever our Army might desire to follow them and to any extent.

Whatever may have been said by the officers of our Army, whose testimony has been read here, about that being the only remedy, I think they speak as men of war and not as statesmen. They may desire the commencement of a war in which they may lead their troops into the Territory of Mexico. I know not what may be the motive; but for any soldier, for any statesman to advocate the right of one nation to send even its civil force into the territory of a neighboring country with whom we are at peace would seem to be very poor statesmanship. But to go beyond that and say our armies, commencing with two or three regiments and to increase as occasion and circumstances might require, should pass into the heart of a sister republic, it seems to me this House, this Congress is not prepared to say. Sir, if such a proposition were made in regard to one of the strong powers of the earth it would not have a moment's hearing in this House. Suppose, sir, that for some reasop or other a bill was before this Congress to authorize the President to send two regiments or ten regiments into Canada for any purpose whatever, who in this House would dare on such an issne and such a violation of the laws of neutrality to advocate it upon this floor with Great Britain looking on in the distance. Not one, sir; and shall we do it to any distracted sister republic when we would not dare do it, when we would not dare pass such a bill, or make such an order in the face of the great nations of the earth!

I have said all I desire in calling the attention of the gentleman from Texas and of the committee to the danger of inaugurating a civil war, which will lead to far greater loss of life, to far greater destruction of property, to far greater deprivation of the rights of our citizens whoever they may be than by this maranding, which must lead to measures the result of which, if appreciated by Mexico, must result in war, must result in raising larger armies, must result in loss of the lives of our citizens, and must result in immense expenditure from the Treasury. Now, sir, forseeing that would be the inevitable result of giving the authority provided for in the second section of this bill, I would desire this committee to reconsider this matter, and if two or three regiments are not enough to protect our frontier on our own soil and within our own borders let them propose to Congress ten regiments, or twenty regiments if need be, and in my judgment the American people would sanction the raising of a sufficient force to protect the remotest citizen of the United States in his property, in his home, in his life.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Chairman, as one of the committee which took the testimony and agreed to the report, I indorse full and absolutely all the resolutions which have been reported. I desire to say a few words for the consideration of the House. It is no slight question we are to pass upon in determining the proper action of the American Congress upon this matter. In the first place, the President of the United States, in the discharge of his official high duties, specially recommended this subject to the attention of the House in his annual message. In the next place, the House appointed a special committee, not from the border immediately invaded, but a fair representation of the whole nation, disinterested men, men removed from any possibility of excitement upon this matter, who gave a fair, full, diligent consideration to the question.

Now, sir, I start with this assumption, that a nation, like an individual, has the right of self-defense, and that it must exercise it if it intends to live. The integrity of our territory and the safety of our people in every part of this Union, not merely in Texas but everywhere else, are the chief purpose for which Government was established. The government which does not do that is not worthy of the name of government. And if the United States should refuse to exercise that high function of sovereignty or should declare itself unable to do it, they will put themselves at once upon the same low grade that our sister-republic, Mexico, now occupies.

The condition is this: On one side of that river is a nation which has power. On the other side is a loose confederation whose situation is chronic insurrection, organized anarchy, incapable or unwilling central government, disorderly, rebellious, broken states, where anarchy is the rule. Now, when that is the case; when the obligations of law are not maintained in a country; when it has neither the will nor the force to keep its own citizens in order, then it ceases to fulfill the chief duty of government. But when it goes further than that, and either willfully organizes or permits to be organized upon its territory armed, marauding bands to invade another republic, the countenancing or tolerating on the part of that government of such marauding is in itself cause of war to the nation invaded.

I will answer the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] But for the very weakness of Mexico these incursions would have been punished long ago by war. Sir, if Canada, backed by the entire power of Great Britain, had endeavored to commit upon the northern border one-hundredth part of what is proven here, the insulted majesty of the nation would have risen, and we would have punished it at any and all cost.

Now, sir, it is not necessary for me at this time to follow out the picture which has been presented by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.] Here is a long frontier line. On the right bank of the river, the Mexican side, is a poor and barren country, incapable of supporting the population which is now there, which is not a settled and orderly population at all, not a population which subsists by the ordinary industries that men of peaceful habits carry on, but which, according to the clear and undeniable proof presented before the committee, subsists in the main by spoliation upon our Territories. It is a hot-bed of smugglers, marauders, robbers, and assassins. And this country has shown a toleration to this weak neighbor unexampled in the history of all nations. On the other side, the left bank of the river, the American side, is a delta country not very thickly populated, admirably adapted for grazing, full of herds, with some small ranches scattered along the line and some small towns.

The proof before us undeniably is that incursion after incursion of armed bands have crossed that river; that men known, named, described, individualized, have pushed their attacks far into the country; that they have threatened towns of considerable size; that they have burned buildings; that they have murdered American citizens standing in defense of their property, upon their own soil and under their own flag. Are these things to go on, sir? Are they to be tolerated by a country that in 1812 was ready to go to war with the strongest power of the world for the individual liberty of its seamen? The history is all distinct and clear. There is no evasion. There is no possibility of mistake. It comes to us from citizens of known character and of established reputation. It comes to us from our military officers upon that frontier. And that story accords all the way through.

It is true, sir, that from the peculiarities of that country, from the chaparral which covers a great portion of it near the river, from the few roads that are cut through that chaparral and the by-roads known to these marauders, pursuit along that long line of frontier is difficult. The river itself is fordable two-thirds of the time—is it not?

Mr. HANCOCK. It is.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is a line of at least four hundred miles of frontier, which is penetrable and penetrated at all hours of the day and night by these bands organized upon Mexican soil, organized under the eyes of Mexican state authorities, although I do not say indorsed by the central government. And the fruits of their rapine and robberies are openly taken down to the city of Matamoras and shared with the high officials of that government. And the Mexican government tells us frankly that they cannot stop it.

Now, sir, if my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would brush up his acquaintance with those good books which teach us what international law is, he would know that every writer upon international law recognized as authority anywhere declares the right of one country, after having endured and represented its wrongs and obtained no relief, either from unwillingness or inability on the part of the government of the other to follow the robber, to follow the marauder, to take him redhanded in the act, and by the strong hand recover back the things which have been stolen, and punish the offender, even on another soil. There is no difference in the authorities upon that question. There cannot be, because it is simply an application of the grand right of self-defense; that is all. And you might just as well say that if I caught a man attempting to break into my house and I chased him into another man's lot to catch him I was a trespasser on the lot of my neighbor in that lawful undertaking. I regret that the Library is shut. I had sent for some books on that question. The law is clear upon that point. The right of the United States to do this thing is undisputed. And it is not cause of war on the part of Mexico, because Mexico herself has given the occasion and forced the necessity upon this Government. And that is the reason of the law.

These resolutions provide, the second resolution especially, that the President of the United States shall be authorized in his discretion to order pursuit by the military authorities. And I regret to hear the gentleman from Michigan talking about the Army of the United States in the way he did. The Army of the United States is the right hand of the Government for certain purposes. Among those purposes is the defense of the integrity of our territory. And I regretted to hear the gentleman from Michigan argue that they shall continue to stand there as some of these citizens have testified to us they have done—stand with their arms in their hands, arriving ten minutes or half an hour too late, with these cattle-thieves across the river within decent gunshot, hurling back all sorts of insults that the Spanish language, which is fruitful in that kind of thing, affords, upon the unsuccessful pursuers—that they shall stand there with their arms folded, and not be authorized to follow the wrong-doer wherever he goes.

Now, sir, these are the grounds upon which the committee, with absolute unanimity, presented these resolutions for the consideration of the House. Does the gentleman from Michigan think it is more dangerous to keep the peace between these two conterminus countries, to allow the organized troops of the United States, under responsible officers, to cross, pursue, arrest, recover, or to take the other alternative, which will come with any people that is as proud as our people are? Let the Government neglect them there much longer, and they will take the remedy into their own hands; and undisciplined bands of American men, tolerating this sort of thing no longer, led not by officers, who act under responsibilty to the Government, but by temporary commanders whom they may choose, with all their feelings sharpened up and set on edge by the memory of the wrongs that have been done them, will swarm across that frontier, and then the possibility of war with Mexico may come; and that is the only way in which it can come.

This is no new thing. It is not now so many years ago since Colonel Mackenzie crossed that dividing line between the United States and Mexico in pursuit of marauders—to be sure they were Indians in that case, but that makes very little difference—followed them to their haunts and punished them there. And the Mexican government has never considered that as any cause of war.

It may be that we should be able by the mere adoption of these resolutions to stimulate the Mexican government into such prompt action there as will keep that border quiet. If after having had notice by the passage of these resolutions through Congress (and they have had notice enough already) they should decline to do their known duty, the duty which belongs to a government, the duty for which governments are constituted, the duty of keeping their own people within bounds and preventing outbreaks of the nature which have been proven before this committee, if they then fail to do that, they will have no right, in the eye of the law of civilization or of high morals, to question the action of the United States if it should be followed by a solid, substantial, sharp, and decisive punishment of these men upon their own soil.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has referred to the report of a certain commission. Well, sir, a part of these questions have been the subjects of commission from this side and from the other. The gentleman, I think, has confounded the mixed commission which has been sitting for other purposes, and which has concluded its labors, with the subject-matter of this investigation. Up to this time no satisfactory attempt has ever been made by the authorities in Mexico to stop these wrongs.

Now, viewing the case as I do, I think I am absolutely dispassionate about it. I do not live on any frontier that is liable to be invaded, either the Texas frontier to be invaded from Mexico or the Michigan frontier to be invaded from Canada. I suppose the principal difficulty with my friend is that he lives upon the Michigan frontier and may be invaded some day from Canada. In the safe security of my own inland home I consider this subject as fairly and dispassionately as it is possible for any man to do. I simply look upon it in this light: I have before me overwhelming proof that, in violation of treaty stipulations, in violation of that comity which should exist between nations, in violation of the sanctity of our territory, in violation of the sovereignty of our flag, America citizens for the last ten years at least, I cannot say how much longer, have been hounded and persecuted, attacked and harassed; their industries have been broken up, they have been compelled to abandon their homes, their ranches which once held families are abandoned and those families have been taken into the interior towns.

Now, I say with all deliberation that it is a disgrace and a shame to the American nation and name that such things have been suffered so long. If it should so happen that the Mexican government shall assume that such action on the part of these United States as is indicated by these resolutions is cause of war, then in that case the Mexican government will be, as she has been in other cases, altogether in the wrong. And if war must come it could not come in a better cause then that of maintaining the inviolability of our territory and the safety and security of our citizens and their property.

INDEMNITY FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, the bill for the relief of John Jackson, now on the Private Calendar, is a measure of no little importance. A majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs have presented a report adverse to, while a minority of said committee, of whom I am one, have submitted their views to the consideration of this House in support of this claim. The amount in question is inconsiderable in itself, but the principle involved is one of the highest importance to a class of people in whom I feel the very liveliest interest; they belong to the frontier, many of whom I represent, all of whom I love. Besides, sir, it will serve to illustrate a primary principle which I insist a good government cannot well disregard. After careful examination, I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment the General Government is both morally and legally bound to indemnify its citizens for losses sustained by Indian depredations.

It is an elementary proposition that man in his relation to society originally surrendered certain of his natural rights that he might have secure protection in the exercise of the rights reserved. It has been suggested by a distinguished law writer "that the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature, but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities." It is certainly the duty of the citizen to yield obedience to the laws of his country and contribute to its maintenance, in return for which he is entitled to protection in the enjoyment of life and property. The compact is mutual, the obligations are reciprocal. If the citizen fail in the performance of his part of the contract there is an adequate remedy in favor of the Government. If he violates law there is punishment provided; if he contributes not according to his means to the support of the Government, there is always and usually an easy and efficient way to reach him. On the other hand, if the Government fails or neglects to secure its citizens in the enjoyment of rights guaranteed there should be an ample remedy in his favor. These principles, I apprehend, are peculiarly and forcibly applicable to the claim to which I am directing consideration and all others of similar character. I am constrained to admit that I cannot precisely define, nor do I indeed exactly comprehend, the relationship of Indians, who preserve a tribal character, to the United States. While we treat with them, or formerly have, the Indian tribes throughout the United States are not foreign nations, their relations to the General Government being those of a ward to his guardian.

It must be borne in mind that the Government assumes and exercises exclusive jurisdiction. A State Legislature has no jurisdiction over the Indian Territory contained within the limits of such State.

Nor can a State during the existence of tribal character withdraw the Indians within its limits from the operation of the laws of Congress by conferring on them the rights of citizenship. (3 Wallace, page 407.)

I also understand that it is insisted, if not established beyond question, that if the tribal organization of Indian bands be recognized as existing by the National Government the government of the State within whose boundaries they are located has no right to treat them as subjects. (5 Wallace, page 737.)

I profoundly regret that, mainly by reason of the foregoing principle and the action of the General Government in the enforcement thereof, the murderers of my fellow-citizens on Lost River, in Oregon, were shielded from trial in the civil courts and protected from punishment by the civil authority of that State. Not only so, sir, but it pains me to remember that certain of those black-hearted, bloodthirsty murderers were paraded throughout the United States and publicly exhibited to a gazing, gaping, wondering populace, while their hands were yet reeking with the life-blood of some of the very best people of my State. I am informed, though surely it possesses no special significance, they even enjoyed the distinguished privilege of a reception by the Chief Magistrate of this grand Republic. Widows and orphans, homeless and houseless, so rendered by the savagery of the "pet wards" of the Government, so rendered by those who enjoy special favor and immunity at our hands, appeal to us for aid. Shall it be in vain? Is there then no remedy? If not, should none be provided? The General Government seems reluctant to allow the punishment of an Indian by the State for the violation of a law thereof, nor does it seem disposed to secure to a citizen injured the right of an action for damages, however inefficient it might prove. The General Government by its neglect has suffered the Indians to trespass upon the rights of the whites, to commit depredations, and thereupon protects them from arrest and punishment by the local courts. Then it is urged, and I am quite astonished at it, that the Government, albeit it surrounds the Indians with the strong arm of protection, is under no obligation to make indemnification for property destroyed by them. A proposition more contradictory in itself I cannot conceive, nor yet one more unworthy a respectable Government. By such reasoning it would appear that it is the policy of the Government to foster and cherish within our midst an element to distress and annoy the law-abiding citizens of the country.

It seems to me that the exact terms of existing law fully sustain the view I endeavor to urge. The common law is clear. Our statutes are equally so. The fourteenth section of an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved March 20, 1802, is as follows:

That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall come over or cross the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representive, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose; who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent, or other person authorized as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantee to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, by crossing over the line, on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting, within the limits of any State or district, of any Indian having so offended: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed, by any such Indian, out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.—(Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 143, section 14.)

Section 17 of an act amendatory of the foregoing act, approved

June 30, 1834, renews the guarantee of the Government and reiterates the obligation resting upon us. It is as follows:

That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from the Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or subagent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, it shall be the duty of such superintendent, agent, or subagent to make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper in the opinion of the President, to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantee to the party so injured an eventual indemnification: Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That unless such claim shall be presented within three years after the commission of the injury the same shall be barred. And if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall at the next payment of the annuity be deducted therefrom and paid to the party injured; and if no annuity is payable to such nation or tribe, then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension and punishment of any Indians having so offended. (Statutes at Large, volume 4, page 731, section 17.)

By these laws the liability of the Government was most clearly fixed and ultimate indemnity was absolutely assured. True, these laws were subsequently modified. The reasons for this modification pass my understanding. Up to that time—1859—as appears, the law was most explicit. It very wisely deprived the injured party of his right to indemnification if he sought to obtain private satisfaction or revenge. In my judgment that policy was in the interest of justice, humanity, and economy, and it never should have been modified. Assuring ultimate indemnification restrained the spirit of retaliation, removed the disposition to seek redress by reprisals, prevented murder, pillage, and arson. A great incentive to violence was thereby withdrawn. War, its consequent expense, as also the sacrifice of precious lives, were thereby prevented. It was a direct and efficient method of preserving peace between the settlers upon the frontier and the Indian tribes. One Indian war prevented by such a policy saved a greater loss, a greater expense to the Government than the amounts required to indemnify the people for their losses. Indeed, I do not believe that it ever was the design of Congress to abandon this policy. That it was expedient to deny our responsibility because of largely-accruing claims is an argument which possesses no moral force and is not true in fact. That we should maintain this rule to its fullest and furthest extent while the Indians were numerous and their depredations consequently great and abandon it now, when the reverse is the case, is beyond my comprehension. Claims honest and well founded cannot, in fact, be greater now than heretofore. The word "expedient," however attractive and potential it may be to others, I am free to say I do not admire. We disregard a fundamental obligation, we withhold promised protection, and women weep and children starve because, alas! it is "expedient." Such a word might characterize the cold, the cruel, and the selfish. Can it, however, illustrate the character of a great and generous people?

The amendment of 1859, to which I have referred, is as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontier, approved June 30, 1834," as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in the said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities, as prescribed in said act. (2 Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 401, section 8.)

However uncertain, though I do not deem it so, may be the precise legal obligation resting upon us, the moral obligation remains unimpaired. We should not if we could avoid it. Though not wholly analogous, the principle is still applicable. If any citizen is injured by the action or non-action of a foreign government, he has a well-founded claim against such government which we are bound to protect and enforce. In the case of the Indians whose conduct the Government measurably guarantees, the obligation is surely stronger. The fact that in many instances the Indians are pecuniarily unable to make reparation should not be permitted to remove or diminish our liability. Such a policy would seem to give license to marauding bands of Indians with whom our Government will not so favorably treat and who are wholly irresponsible.

Besides, sir, it must be remembered that the law providing for indemnification for depredation from annuities due to Indian tribes no longer exists. Section 2098 of the Revised Statutes expressly provides that—

No part of the moneys which may be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses incurred in Indian affairs, to pay annuities due to, or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of, any tribe or tribes of Indians, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or may be committed by such tribe or tribes, or any member or members thereof. No claims for Indian depredations shall be paid until Congress shall make special appropriation therefor. (Section 2098 Revised Statutes United States.)

Is it not clearly the contemplation of this section that Congress shall make appropriation for the payment of claims for depredations committed by Indians? I think so. This law does not restrict the obligation. It merely defines the manner by which such claims shall be satisfied by the Congress of the United States and out of the Treasury thereof. If there be any doubt whatever, it is wholly removed by subsequent legislation. By the seventh section of the act of Congress making appropriations for the Indian Department, approved May 29, 1872, it is enacted—

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and cause to be published such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under existing laws or treaty stipulations, for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims; he shall carefully investigate all such claims as may be presented, subject to the rules and regulations prepared by him, and report to Congress at each session thereof the nature, character, and amount of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence upon which his action was based: Provided, That no payment on account of said claim shall be made without a specific appropriation by Congress.

What, in all earnestness, I appeal to know, is meant, if remedy at the hands of Congress is not intended? Is it an idle mockery, a painful snare, a melancholy delusion? Why this illusive phantom of hope, why this sad and gloomy disappointment? Why is the unlucky victim directed how to present his claim? Why are rules and regulations issued as to the manner of producing and the character of proof? Why is the claimant required or invited to incur the expense necessary to sustain his claim, if there are to be no benefits arising therefrom? Why is the Secretary of the Interior required to examine and report to Congress upon this character of claims the amount allowed by him and the evidence upon which his action is based? Is this law a dead-letter or is the whole thing a grim and ghastly joke? To my mind it would be a deplorable circumstance, indeed, if the reckless and lawless wards of the Government should be surrounded by the strong arms of governmental protection, while States and suffering citizens are helpless to redress their grievances. The Indian is protected in his rights and unhappily shielded in his wrongs. For the poor settler, whose premises are invaded, whose property is destroyed by them, there is no adequate civil remedy The law questions the authority of our State courts, and I regret to observe that there is a disposition upon the part of many to refuse any, all, and every relief at the hands of the Government. It is unnecessary for me to repeat that reservations are not within the jurisdiction of the State. Is it, then, or not, the duty of the Government to keep the Indians within those limits? In my opinion it is manifestly the duty of the Government so to restrain them. Now, then, if we fail to confine them within the proper limits, if by our negligence we permit the Indians to go beyond the same and destroy the property of our fellow-citizens—I insist, yea, I earnestly protest—that indemnification should be made to the fullest and amplest extent out of the Treasury of the United States. I am confirmed in my judgment. So long as I am a member of this body my voice shall be heard, my vote cast, and my influence exercised in favor of honoring this class of claims, sustaining a moral and maintaining a legal obligation.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the question of protection to American industries has been so often, so elaborately, and so ably discussed that I would remain silent, except to record my vote against the pending bill, but for the fact that I represent a district deeply, vitally interested in the subject. I do not propose to weary the House or fill up the RECORD with a profound and philosophical essay upon abstract theories illustrated with numerous tables of ponderous figures; but I wish briefly, yet earnestly, to protest against a change of policy looking toward free trade. In view of the magnitude of our national debt, absolute free trade cannot become a possibility within the allotted period of our lives, unless indeed direct taxation be substituted for customs duties and a swarm of tax-gatherers, not as numerous but quite as odious as the plagues sent upon ancient Egypt, should be scattered through the land to harrass and despoil. Aside from the question of protection, it seems impossible to doubt which process of collecting revenue would be most equitable and acceptable to the people. A certain sum must be raised annually to defray the current expenses of the Government and to preserve the faith which the nation has pledged to the holders of its obligations. Each citizen should bear his portion of the common burden, should pay his portion of the common debt. The duties levied upon imports accomplish this result because imported articles are used and consumed by the general public. In this way each man makes his contribution to the Federal Treasury without the offensive personal demand of the gatherer of direct taxes. I need not remind this House of the discontent and outspoken indignation everywhere seen and heard at the enforced collection of the income tax. The feeling was so universal and intense that those laws were repealed. But the customs dues are collected by a process so simple and fair and so far removed from the masses of the people that they scarcely realize the fact or feel the effect. So that, as a mere matter of convenience, economy, and consideration for public feeling the necessary revenues should as far as possible be collected in the shape of duties on imports.

But it is strangely argued that lower duties will yield greater revenue. This belief being based on the assumption that there will be much greater importations under a low tariff, it follows necessarily that the home products will be diminished to the extent of the increased imports, and to that extent those engaged in manufacturing must seek other employment or starve, and those who continue at such labor must do so at greatly reduced wages; and the capital thus invested cannot be transferred, but crumbles into ruin and carries its owner into bankruptcy.

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, a tariff properly adjusted fosters home industries, develops the great resources of our country, invites immigration, gives employment and fair wages to multitudes of our people. It is no reproach to the skill and enterprise of American workmen that they are unable without Government protection to compete with the labor of other countries. Let it rather be the boast of our manufacturers and of all our citizens that there is no desire to rival any nation which finds a profit in the oppressive and half-paid industry of its toiling people. Admit, for the moment, that a protective tariff increases the price of the manufactured article and is to that extent a tax upon the consumer, who is there would be relieved from that tax at the expense of the comfort, the health, the happiness of the beneficiaries? Who would want to see American workmen degraded and debased to the level of pauper labor? Who would like to read of American women that "they work day and night, toil and slave, so long as they can get something to satisfy their half-starving families?" Who would want to buy, even at a lower price, nails and spikes and chains made by a nursing mother laboring ten hours a day and receiving $2 per week? Yet this is the lamentable account of the miserable condition of affairs in Lancashire. Civilization, humanity, decency, blush at the recital! We want no such experience in this country.

There is a standing denunciation of him who oppresseth the poor, left on record for all nations. Unjust and cruel as such a policy is everywhere, it is especially unwise in this country, where all citizens are equal before the law, where each has an equal share with all the others in making the laws and molding the Government. In view of this fact, there are manifest reasons why all classes should be educated and elevated and made to feel the strong arm of the Government around them, not only for defense, but to sustain and uphold. The glory and power of the nation consists in the prosperity and happiness of its citizens; and he is no true patriot who advocates a policy tending to prevent or impede or impair the comfort, the independence, the elevation of the laboring-men of the land. In countries where there is no suffrage, or a limited suffrage, humanity alone suggests the improved condition of the poor. But here it becomes not only a Christian but a patriotic duty to provide every facility for improvement and advancement.

I have argued upon the assumption that a protective tariff increases to the consumer the price of manufactured articles. But this is not necessarily so. Without a tariff the products of cheap labor would be put upon our market, and, unrestrained by competition here, would exact the highest price the purchaser could pay. Foreigners would be masters of the market and all classes of our people would be the sufferers. Of many illustrations of this statement I refer only to the article of Bessemer steel. But little more than ten years ago steel rails of English manfacture were sold in New York at $185 per ton. Under the encouraging influence of a protective tariff American capitalists built and experimented, and as each new mill went into successful operation the price was reduced, until now the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, in my own district, one of the largest and most complete establishments in the world, is turning out steel rails equal to the best that ever were imported and at less than one-third the price charged before we had any home manufactories. The same result has followed with axes, edge-tools, general hardware, cotton goods, and many other articles, and it is fair to infer that this experience will be continued and enlarged. Hence it appears that the encouragement given to American manufactures reduces instead of increases the cost thereof to the purchaser.

In order to secure this result and at the same time to maintain the true worth and dignity of labor, the Government must protect home capital against an unfair and unequal contest with foreign capital, strengthened and supported by stinted and oppressed labor. Men of large means and liberal minds, with energy and public spirit ready to employ their wealth and to give employment to their fellowmen, will not build furnaces and rolling-mills, glass-houses, cotton-factories and woolen-mills, founderies and machine-shops, and other useful industries with the alternative of being driven from the market by the competition of unpaid labor, or of being compelled to force their employés down to the abject and pitiable condition of those whose products would force this issue. But encouraged to give a generous remuneration to honest toil, and to receive a fair return for their investments, capitalists with the co-operation of cheerful labor will drag from the earth its crude and hidden treasures, and mold them into a multitude of products of universal use and of untold value. And thus the wonderful resources of this country are developed, and the true wealth of the nation is increased. Capital and labor, appreciating their mutual dependence upon each other, work in harmony, and the beneficent results are seen upon every hand.

Looking at the present depressed condition of our manufacturing interests, the thoughtless have said that "protection does not protect." But it must be remembered that there is quite as much gloom and distress and bankruptcy among the manufacturers of England. And hence the argument would apply with equal force against free trade. But it is as unfair to take an exceptional period of general disaster to illustrate the history of trade as it would be to judge the usual course of nature by an occasional earthquake or tempest.

The same men who claim that "protection does NOT protect" at other times speak of the present as a prohibitory tariff. The argument might well be turned upon them by showing that prohibition does not prohibit. During the past few years the importation of dutiable articles has averaged about $400,000,000 per year; surely enough to satisfy the most eager longing for foreign commodities; and enough to show that the existing tariff, in the aggregate, is none too high.

The first tariff act of the American Congress was passed on July 4, 1789, and its preamble stands as true to-day as when first written. It is in these words:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid, &c.

The second century of this nation's history opens with the same state of facts which marked the early years of the first and we are called upon as imperatively as our predecessors of the last century were to maintain a tariff high enough to accomplish the objects to be attained.

We have to-day every reason which impelled Thomas Jefferson in 1816 to say:

> The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us to a dependence on that nation, or be clothed in skins and live like wild beasts. I am proud to say I am not one of these.
> Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

With this authority to sustain the protection policy, I seek no other.

Practical results are better arguments than the most attractive theories. I have already referred to the reduction of the price of manufactured articles, which has been secured by building up home industries to check the otherwise arbitrary demands of foreign monopolists. But more than that, protection has added to the wealthy population, prosperity, and power of this country far beyond the power of figures to express. The greater portion of my life has been spent in the midst of a manufacturing community, where I have seen the ebb and flow of prosperity, and have marked the struggles and the triumphs of honest industry fostered by governmental care. Despite the unparalleled advantages with which a bountiful Providence endowed her, Pittsburgh would have been but a respectable village, or at best a puny city, without the introduction of manufactories and the encouragement to contest the market with old and able rivals.

Pittsburgh now has a population, including the adjacent city of Allegheny, identical in interests, of 220,000. "The area occupied by the two cities is equal to thirty-four square miles, or 22,000 acres, extending up the Allegheny River five miles and up the Monongahela about eight miles and down the Ohio River about three miles. It has four hundred miles of streets, and the two rivers are spanned by eleven bridges, whose aggregate length is about three and a half miles.

"Throughout all these miles of streets are scattered the factories, the furnaces, the mills, and workshops which have originated for Pittsburgh the sobriquet of the Birmingham of America. What those establishments aggregate in bulk is best shown by stating that if they were placed in a compact form they would form a body or would occupy a space of eighteen hundred and sixty-seven acres, or extend seventy-seven miles, giving each an average space of two hundred by two hundred feet.

"The packages in which the glass produced in her factories is packed, if placed in compact shape in a row six feet high by three broad, would extend over ninety miles each year, and the straw used to pack it would need two thousand acres of ground to grow it annually.

"The barges and tow-boats used to transport her yearly product of coal taken out of the Monongahela River alone would, if placed in a continuous line, form a walk of fifty miles, while to transport the whole product of her mines by rail would require over three thousand miles of cars, each holding ten tons. The lumber used in her sash, door, and box factories and planing-mills would build a board walk each year ten feet broad and one thousand miles long.

"The wages annually paid in the factories and collieries would require one man forty-one hundred and thirty-three hours, or one hundred and seventy-two days, to count it in single dollars, at the rate of one hundred and twenty a minute, and would pave with silver half dollars a street forty feet wide and one mile long. These figures present, in perhaps a somewhat fanciful shape, some of the indications that determine the magnitude of the city, and convey, in connection with the statement made of the area of the city, what Pittsburgh is in bulk. The entire wages paid in the manufactories of Pittsburgh are over $30,000,000 annually, and the capital in the buildings and machinery of her factories alone and the ground they occupy is as nearly as could be arrived at $43,216,955."

These thousands and tens of thousands of artisans actively employed in producing articles of necessary use in the various trades and in agricultural pursuits are in their turn the consumers of produce far beyond the supply of that vicinity. Thus each class of citizens helps and is helped by the others. Herein consists the strongest bond of unity and peace. Let all localities and all pursuits realize their mutual dependence and manifest a mutual sympathy, and no tongue can describe or imagination conceive the fullness of the prosperity and glory which the opening century will bring to bless this nation. Let the policy of protection assure to the capitalist safety and a fair return for his investment, liberal remuneration to those whose brawny arms are the country's best defense in war and whose intelligent judgment is the country's surest hope in peace, and the Republic will march on through its second century panoplied in power and exulting in the affectionate fidelity and earnest patriotism of her happy and hopeful sons.

TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to discuss this subject of the Texas border troubles, but the hour is now quite late. With the assurance of the gentleman who has this joint resolution in charge [Mr. SCHLEICHER] that I will have an opportunity to speak upon this subject on a future occasion, I will, if it is desired, give way to a motion that the committee now rise; otherwise I shall feel bound, with my notions of duty, to proceed with the discussion to-night.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The gentleman will have an opportunity on another occasion to address the House on this subject. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DANIEL CLARY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of House bill No. 3147, granting a pension to Daniel Clary, a soldier of the Mexican war. This bill was unanimously recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and would have been disposed of this afternoon in a few minutes had the Calendar been longer considered. This soldier contracted a disease from which total blindness has resulted, and from no fault of his own has been kept out of his pension for some years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without raising any question in regard to the propriety of bringing the bill before the House at this time, and reserving any point of order which may be raised upon it, I desire to submit a motion that the House now adjourn so that this matter may come up to-morrow as unfinished business.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will not come up to morrow as unfinished business unless it is taken out of the Committee of the Whole, as this is private bill day.

Mr. HOLMAN. The attendance of members now is very small, and I do not think any legislation should be had in so thin a House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now brought before the House.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel Clary, a private in Company F, Fourth Illinois Volunteers in the Mexican war, and to pay him a pension to take effect from and after the 1st day of January, 1873.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill does not indicate the grade in the Army which this soldier held.

Mr. RUSK. And the bill is retroactive, granting a pension back to 1873, contrary to the rule which has been adopted by our committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the time at which he should have received his pension if he had made application in time.

Mr. RUSK. Equitably it may be held they should all receive pensions from the date of their discharge; but it is the rule of the committee not to grant any back pensions.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman will not object to this bill when he hears the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ELLIS: Memorial of the officers of the Citizens' Bank of New Orleans, Louisiana, for the repeal of the law which imposes a tax of 10 per cent. on circulating notes issued by banks established under State charters.

Also, the petition of Benjamin Singeltary, of Louisiana, for a rehearing of his claim disallowed by the southern claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GIBSON: Memorial of E. G. W. Butler, for compensation for supplies taken by the United States Army during the late war, to the same committee.

By Mr. SAYLER: The petition of the leading business firms of Cincinnati, Ohio, against abuses of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Company in rates imposed for the carriage of freights, and praying for relief, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 1, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2626) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the officers and soldiers engaged in the war with Mexico the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PUBLICATION OF DISTRICT TAX LIST.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 29, 1876.

SIR: The commissioners of the District of Columbia, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the United States requiring them to inform the Senate whether any costs or charges have been paid by property-owners within the District for or on account of the publication of the list of delinquent tax-payers prior to the publication of such list, and, if any, what amount of costs and charges have been so paid, together with the names of the persons so paying the same, and that they furnish the Senate a copy of the contract for printing such list and the amount paid under such contract, have now the honor to forward to you the accompanying exhibit made by the collector of the District, together with his letter in explanation.

It will be seen that the entire amount of costs and charges collected of tax-payers between the day on which the delinquent tax list was placed in the hands of the printer for publication and the actual appearance of the advertised list was $135.75.

It was part of the agreement made with the contractor at the time of signing the contract that, on account of the short time given him to prepare such an extended list—covering twenty-seven pages of the National Republican—for publication at the very moderate price fixed in the contract and the cost changes would impose upon him, he should not be required to cut out any part of the list as furnished him by the collector, but should be paid for the whole.

The delinquent tax payer had imposed upon the District the expense of preparing the tax-list by voluntarily neglecting to pay his tax, and when that list was once in the hands of the printer, to whom it was given at the latest possible date for its publication on the day fixed in the tax law, the entire expense of the advertising had been met by the District.

The cost of publishing the entire list was $8,250.75.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. THOS. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of 200 soldiers, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of the bill for the equalization of bounties, so as to allow each soldier, sailor, and marine $8.33 per month for the time served; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOOTH presented the memorial of the Right Reverend William Ingraham Kip, bishop of California, and eight other clergymen, remonstrating against the amendment to the shipping act of 1872 relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Dr. Robert McCracken, late acting assistant surgeon of the United States Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ISSUE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred certain amendments by the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, to report them back and ask that the amendments of the House to the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be asked on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, and request a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. SHERMAN, BOUTWELL, and BOGY were appointed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education, to report it with an amendment. The amendment restricts the publication to 10,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner. As we have no means of sending away documents except at our own cost, it seems undesirable that we should print a large number of public documents. I ask for the reading of the resolution as proposed to be amended, and move its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. As I heard the resolution read I did not understand what year the report is for or whether any year is named.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is for the current year.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should be glad to have it reported again. I do not think it specifies any year. I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to that fact.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to insert "for the year 1875." It is so in the original, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

PUBLIC LANDS WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred copies of Senate bill No. 34, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The Senator who introduced it is not inclined to press the motion to print extra copies.

The report was agreed to.

LANDS CONFIRMED TO SAN JOSÉ.

Mr. BOGY. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 655) to confirm to the city of San José, in the State of California, the title to certain lands, to report it back without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. This bill simply sets the statute of limitations running. It is very simple and explains itself. I believe it is a unanimous report from the committee, and I ask that the bill be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It relinquishes to the city of San José, California, its successors and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all the lands confirmed to that city by the final decree of the district court of the United States for the district of California by its decree entered in the cause entitled "The United States against the Mayor and Common Council of the City of San José," on the 13th of June, 1866, pursuant to the decree and mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States in that cause, subject to the deductions, reservations, and limitations contained in the decree.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1026) for the relief of Thomas Van Duzen and his assigns for lands, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 719) for the relief of the heirs of William Stevens, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 963) in relation to the cancellation of mortgages in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WRIGHT. In presenting this bill I wish to say one word. There has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia a House bill No. 3740, providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia. I ask that this bill may go to the Committee on the District of Columbia; and as I see that I have the attention of my friend from Kansas, [MR. INGALLS,] a member of the committee, I suggest the propriety of adding this as an amendment to the House bill No. 3740, if they shall esteem it a proper measure. I call their attention at this time to it, and ask that they may report it back at their leisure, so that it may be considered; and, if they cannot report it back, that it may be offered as an amendment by me without objection on their part, to the bill when it is taken up. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 964) for the establishment of certain post-routes in West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 965) granting a pension to Bridget Collins, widow of John Collins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 770) for the relief of Judson S. Post, of Missouri, late disbursing officer of the United States Navy; and

An act (S. No. 960) to continue the public printing.

ANDERSON J. SMITH.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no resolutions or other morning business I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 597.

Mr. MORTON. There was an understanding this morning that the resolution for Mr. Pinchback should be considered.

Mr. WRIGHT. This bill will only take a few moments. The bill passed both Houses at the last session, and there is no objection in the world to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. As there was an order made for this morning I think I shall have to object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust my friend will not object to this bill. It passed both Houses at the last session and fell by the way. It is again reported from the Military Committee at this session. There is no objection to it in the world. Just the reading of the bill will pass it. If there is any objection I will withdraw it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 597) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith. It directs the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay to Anderson J. Smith, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of an assistant surgeon in the Army from May 6, 1864, to the date of his muster out of service on the 17th day of June, 1865, deducting whatever pay he received for that term as sergeant.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution relative to Mr. Pinchback's pay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks for the present consideration of the resolution agreed to be considered at this time. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he was a contestant up to the period of the determination of the contest by the Senate.

Mr. KELLY. I hope that will not be taken up this morning. It certainly will lead to a prolonged debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding was that it should be taken up.

Mr. KELLY. By unanimous consent?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was superseded on another day by other business, the understanding being that it should be taken up to-day. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. KELLY. I ask leave to complete a bill that the Senator having charge of this resolution will consent to. It is the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon. It is a House bill which was partly discussed here the other day, and I have been too unwell for several days past to come to the Senate and ask to have it disposed of. I hope my colleague who has this resolution in charge will consent that this bill shall be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it was understood that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] should be allowed to complete the bill to which he has referred. He could not find at the moment a statute that he wanted to refer to when the bill was last up, and therefore it went over.

Mr. MORTON. This matter has been put off from time to time for the accommodation of one Senator and another, and if it is further postponed it might as well be abandoned. I would as soon accommodate my friend from Oregon as anybody, but there was a unanimous understanding that this resolution should be taken up this morning. It was agreed to without a dissenting voice that it should come up this morning. I will help my friend at another time, but I think he ought not to press it now.

Mr. KELLY. Very well; if it was the general understanding of the Senate that this resolution should be proceeded with this morning, I shall make no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe it was the understanding; but I hope there will be an understanding that my friend from Oregon shall have an opportunity to have his bill finished.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope so.

Mr. MORTON. I object.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not say now, but I hope after this matter is disposed of the Senator from Oregon will have an opportunity to complete his bill.

Mr. MORTON. After this resolution is disposed of, I shall have no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the reading of the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on the 17th of April:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, having had under consideration the question of the allowance proper to be made to P. B. S. Pinchback, late a contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, submit the following report:

The great length of time that elapsed between the beginning of the term for which Mr. Pinchback was a contestant and the date of the final determination of that contest by the Senate, as also the remarkably close vote by which such contest was decided, have impressed your committee with the belief that the full measure of compensation which the uniform action of the Senate heretofore has given to contestants should be allowed in this case.

Your committee are advised by the journals of the Senate that the rule established by this body in similar cases is, the payment to the contestant of the amount he would have been entitled to receive in case he had been admitted and served the time the contest was pending; in other words, an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator for the time covered by the contest.

A few citations will suffice to show the uniformity of this rule.

O. B. Hart, contesting the seat of A. Gilbert, of Florida, was paid from the contingent fund from the 1st to 28th of April, 1870, under the following resolution, passed May 11, 1870, (Senate Journal second session Forty-first Congress, pages 585 and 634:)

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to O. B. Hart, claimant of a seat in the Senate from the State of Florida, the usual mileage of a Senator, and monthly pay from the date of presenting his credentials until the passage of the resolution declaring him not entitled to a seat."

H. P. Farrow and R. H. Whitely, contesting respectively with J. Hill and H. V. M. Miller, from Georgia, were paid from the 16th of February, 1870, to the 30th of January, 1871, under the following resolution, passed February 25, 1871, (Senate Journal, third session Forty-first Congress, page 369:)

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to H. P. Farrow and R. H. Whitely, contestants from the State of Georgia, compensation from the 16th day of February, 1870, the date of their election by the re-organized Legislature of Georgia, to the 30th day of January, 1871, when the Senate decided they were not entitled to seats."

Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat from the State of Georgia, was paid from March 4, 1871, to December 19, 1871, in pursuance of the following resolution, passed January 9, 1872, (Senate Journal, second session Forty-second Congress, page 94:)

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay, out of the pay and mileage account, to Foster Blodgett, claiming a seat as Senator-elect from the State of Georgia, the pay and mileage of a Senator from March 4, 1871, to December 19, 1871, when the question of his right to his seat was determined by the Senate."

Again, J. C. Abbott, of North Carolina, contesting the seat of Senator RANSOM, was paid from March 4, 1871, to the 23d of April, 1872, under the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, late contestant for a seat in this body, from the State of North Carolina, be allowed his salary from the 4th of March, 1871, to the 23d of April, 1872, and one mileage each way."

This resolution was passed April 24, 1872. (See Senate Journal, second session Forty-second Congress, page 595.)

Numerous other citations might be adduced; these will suffice, however, to establish the uniform rule of the Senate.

This committee, on the 8th of March, 1876, in reporting back Senate resolution No. 10, to pay Francis W. Sykes, of Alabama, contesting with Senator SPENCER, the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, when said contest was decided, submitted (by Mr. COOPER) the following report:

"The rule established by the Senate in cases similar to the present one has been uniform. A person applying for a seat in this body by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application has been refused, and another adjudged entitled to the seat, has been paid the amount he would have been entitled to receive if he had been admitted and served the time the contest was pending. The action of the Senate upon such cases has been with such great unanimity as to call for little or no debate. The reasons therefor upon which the rule is based can only be surmised. It may be said the person claims his seat in pursuance of an implied duty imposed upon him to thus assert the right of his State to be represented in this body, which duty he owes to the public, and that expenses incurred in the performance of a public duty should be paid out of a common Treasury.

"A proper respect for the action of a State in the choice of a Senator may also justify the rule.

"The committee see nothing in the present case to take it out of the general rule; they therefore recommend the passage of the resolution."

The case of Pinchback is (considering the final action of the Senate in the contests of the two cases) parallel with that of Sykes in this, that each claimed under an election by a body adjudged by the Senate afterward not to have been the Legislature of the State. The case of Pinchback, however, is much the stronger from the fact that the alleged legislature from which Mr. Sykes claimed his election was never recognized as the Legislature of the State of Alabama by any of the departments of Government, while the Kellogg legislature of Louisiana, by which Mr. Pinchback was elected, was recognized as the Legislature of that State, not only by the State courts, but by the Executive of the nation, and also by the national House of Representatives, by admitting to its membership persons claiming seats under certificates from Governor Kellogg; and inferentially by the Senate, in the adoption of a resolution recognizing Kellogg as the governor of the State. In view of these judicial, executive, and legislative recognitions of the Kellogg legislature, and of the fact that the Senate, after three years of discussion and consideration, was so evenly divided on the ultimate question as to Mr. Pinchback's right to a seat, it would seem difficult to imagine a stronger case of reasonable cause, than that moving Mr. Pinchback to make claim to a seat, and to persevere as he did in that claim for over three years.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the precedents and the facts of this case, report the following resolution and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he was a contestant up to the period of the determination of the contest by the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. I inquire of the Senator who presents this resolution whether I am correct in understanding the argument of the report to be to this effect: that in all cases of contests here the uniform practice of the Senate has been to pay the contestant the full amount which would have been due him if he had been admitted up to the time that his claim is denied or rejected?

Mr. MITCHELL. So far as I have been able to examine the precedents, that has been the rule.

Mr. WITHERS. Then I would respectfully inquire whether there have not been at least three other claimants or contestants to this seat; and if that be the uniform rule and practice of the Senate, why the names of the other claimants were not incorporated in the resolution, so as to pay them all in accordance with what we are given to understand has been the uniform action of the Senate heretofore?

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot say in reference to that. This was the only case considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections on this reference. These matters are taken up separately. The case of Mr. Sykes, a contestant from the State of Alabama, was considered some time since by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and a resolution was reported and is now on the Calendar proposing to pay Mr. Sykes the same compensation that he would have received, if admitted, for the time that he was contesting.

So far as any cases have been considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I will say to the Senator from Virginia that they have universally, I believe, been reported in accordance with the principle adopted in this report; and in fact in some instances they have gone further. For instance, in the case of H. P. Farrow and R. H. Whitely, contesting respectively with Joshua Hill and H. V. M. Miller, from Georgia; they were paid from the 16th day of February, 1870, to the 30th day of January, 1871, the same compensation that they would have received provided they had been admitted to their seats, and also their mileage; but more liberal than this resolution proposes to pay to Mr. Pinchback, they were paid from the date of their election, not from the date of the presentation of their credentials here; not from the date they would have been entitled to their seats in case they had been admitted, but from the date of their election.

I will say that I have examined the records carefully, and I find no exception to the rule adopted by the report of the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. The argument of the Senator and the precedent upon which it is based it seems to me would go very far toward settling this case, provided it was carried out to its full extent; but I understand from him now that other contestants for this same identical seat have had claims pending which have not been reported upon by the committee; and the committee have not recommended that this precedent which is now referred to should be carried out in their case, and I wish to know why that is so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state in answer to the Senator that there was another contestant at the same time for this same seat, but he abandoned the contest, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WITHERS. It strikes me that the abandonment of the contest does not affect the principle at all. Whether the claimant fails to be admitted to his seat by a voluntary abandonment of his effort to secure it in despair of success, or whether by a vote of the Senate he is refused admission, it seems to me does not affect the principle on which the Senator relies.

Mr. MITCHELL. In that case Mr. McMillen voluntarily abandoned the contest, and by his own voluntary action admitted to the Senate and to the country and to the governor and to his own State that he was here without a shadow of right. He left the contest; went away; said he did not wish to persist any further; and he makes no claim for compensation. It will be time enough to consider that case, I presume, when Mr. McMillen comes here and makes application for compensation and mileage.

Mr. MORTON. The cases have no connection with each other. Mr. McMillen presents no claim. When he presents a claim for compensation, it will be another thing.

I will state to my friend from Virginia in regard to the case from Alabama that this committee reported in favor of paying Mr. Sykes on the same principle precisely. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] made the report, and it is under his care. The fact that it has not been considered by the Senate is because the Senator from Tennessee has been prevented from calling it up by absence. I have always been ready to vote for that resolution as far as I am concerned. The committee reported it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will read what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] says in his report in that case:

> The rule established by the Senate in cases similar to the present one has been uniform. A person applying for a seat in this body by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application has been refused, and another adjudged entitled to the seat, has been paid the amount he would have been entitled to receive if he had been admitted and served the time the contest was pending. The action of the Senate upon such cases has been with such great unanimity as to call for little or no debate. The reasons, therefore, upon which the rule is based can only be surmised. It may be said the person claims his seat in pursuance of an implied duty imposed upon him to thus assert the right of his State to be represented in this body, which duty he owes to the public, and that expenses incurred in the performance of a public duty should be paid out of the common Treasury.
>
> A proper respect for the action of a State in the choice of a Senator may also justify the rule.
> The committee see nothing in the present case to take it out of the general rule; they therefore recommend the passage of the resolution.

Which was to pay him full compensation and mileage.

Mr. WITHERS. And that has never yet been acted on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Never acted on from the fact as stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana that the Senator making the report of the committee has not asked for action upon it. He has never moved to take up the resolution. The committee stand ready, as I understand unanimously to-day, to vote in the Senate, whenever they have an opportunity, to pay Mr. Sykes.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator would accept a suggestion, then, to embody the provision for the payment of these cases which are now pending in the same resolution, I should suppose there would be no difficulty then and perhaps no objection to it; but I am opposed to making a discrimination in two or more cases where the position of the parties is identical, because the report which the Senator has just read in regard to Mr. Sykes is so similar in the position taken as to be absolutely identical in language with that in this case, and all the arguments which can be urged in favor of the one apply with equal force to the other. I do not see the necessity or propriety of any discrimination. I do not see why we should vote to award this pay to one contestant when others do not share the same measure.

Mr. MITCHELL. If that were a proper thing to do as a matter of business in the Senate, I do not know that there would be any particular objection; but there is no reason why we should incorporate the two resolutions together. They have been reported separately; they have been considered separately by the committee; they have each been reported favorably; they are each on the Calendar; and this one has now been taken up for action. The other has not been taken up simply from the fact that the Senator making the report has not asked that it should be taken up. I do not wish to complicate the matter by considering the two together. Let each stand on its own merits.

Though so far as I am concerned I stand ready to vote for both, there is a difference and a very wide difference between the two cases, and that difference is in favor of Mr. Pinchback, and why? Because the legislature that elected Mr. Sykes was what is known as the State-house legislature, a legislature that was never recognized as a legislature by any of the departments of the government in the State of Alabama, or by any branch of the Federal Government, while on the other hand the legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback has been recognized over and over again by the courts of Louisiana, by the Executive of the nation, by the national House of Representatives, and inferentially by the Senate of the United States by a resolution recognizing Governor Kellogg as governor of Louisiana. Therefore I say that the cases are different, widely different, the difference being in favor of the case now under consideration. I hope that this case may be considered on its merits now that it is up before the Senate. If there is anything wrong in the matter, let it be known now. If we are to change the rule simply because the contestant here happens to be a colored man, let us change it and let it go to the country, and let the country know that the rule in relation to compensation for a contestant has never been changed until a colored man makes application and comes before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. It strikes me that, to use a slang expression, the boot is rather on the other leg. I have made no objection to the payment of the claim on account of the color of the claimant.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly the Senator has not.

Mr. WITHERS. But the committee seems to consider it in favor of a black man, and against a white man, when they stand on precisely the same ground, so far as I can see. The distinction drawn by the Senate is not a valid one applicable to the principles which are involved in this case.

I do not propose to embark again in a discussion of all the points involved in the Pinchback claim, of which the Senate and the country have, I am sure, heard enough; and therefore I do not propose to enter at all into the discussion of the question as to which of the legislatures claiming to be the valid legislature in Louisiana was the valid legislature. The Senate by its action in the premises has decided that question when it rejected Mr. Pinchback, as was asserted by his leading champion, the distinguished Senator from Indiana, in all the discussion on the case. That question being settled, the matter of the two legislatures does not come into consideration at all. All I asked was that this precedent, which the Senator claims has been established and followed in so many instances, which has been so universally observed by the Senate, should continue to be observed so far as regards all the applicants for this position if it be observed with regard to one, and that a discrimination be not made against the white man and in favor of the black man. Neither the civil-rights bill nor anything else that I know of demands that that distinction should be made.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator talks about a discrimination. Does the Senator intend to do injustice to the committee?

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly I do not.

Mr. MORTON. Then the Senator should take that back right speedily.

Mr. WITHERS. If I can be convinced that I have done injustice, I certainly will do so.

Mr. MORTON. I tell the Senator that what I have said ought to be satisfactory. This matter of Mr. Sykes before the committee was in charge of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] and when the resolution was agreed upon he was requested to report it to the Senate; and it was left in his charge. This resolution in regard to Pinchback was left in charge of the Senator from Oregon, and he reported it to the Senate on behalf of the committee. They are identical in principle precisely. The Senate would have taken up and considered at any time, I doubt not, the resolution in regard to Mr. Sykes if the Senator from Tennessee had asked it; but the Senator from Virginia knows very well that when a resolution is in charge of a Senator, the etiquette of the Senate is to let him bring it forward at a time that suits him, and that the Senator from Tennessee has not brought that forward. I have always been ready to help him in support of that resolution if he would bring it forward. It was within his charge, but he has not brought it forward. This resolution was in charge of the Senator from Oregon, and he has brought it forward repeatedly. Now, why should the Senator from Virginia talk about discrimination in favor of the colored man against the white man?

Mr. WITHERS. I would beg the Senator to bear in mind that I never alluded to that subject at all until it was introduced by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said that the committee was discriminating in favor of the colored man and against the white man. We have had enough of that sort of thing, in my opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. WITHERS. Whether the Senator has had enough of that sort of thing or not is a matter of indifference to me. I have this to say, that I certainly design no offense to the committee; but I do not think if my remarks are reported correctly it will be found that I asserted that the committee had made a discrimination against one man.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; the Senator said so.

Mr. WITHERS. I said that a discrimination should not be made, and that if it was made it was by providing for this man and not for the others who are in the same position. I am perfectly aware that what the Senator has said in regard to the mode of dealing with propositions in the Senate is correct; but, inasmuch as this proposition comes up in the absence of the Senator from Tennessee, who has been absent for a long time, who was in charge of the other resolution, I saw no objection, so far as I was enabled to understand the question, to both being incorporated in the same resolution, standing as they do admittedly on precisely the same ground.

Mr. MORTON. As to whether the Senator did not in substance say that the committee had discriminated in favor of the colored man and against the white man, it would not be safe for him to consult the record as made at the reporter's table; but if the Senator disclaims it that is enough. I have stated the facts in regard to it, and those facts show that there is no discrimination and that both have been placed precisely upon the same principle. If Mr. Sykes's case has not been considered it has simply been because the Senator in charge of it has not asked the Senate to consider it.

Mr. MITCHELL. In addition to all that, it was on the Calendar months before this resolution was reported by the committee.

Mr. WEST. I have been necessarily absent from the Chamber on business that the Senate undoubtedly is familiar with, and I have risen several times to ask the condition of this matter before the Senate; and I now wish to inquire whether the proposition is to ingraft the Sykes resolution upon the Pinchback resolution?

Mr. WITHERS. I suggested that that might be done.

Mr. WEST. The only objection I can see to that is what the Senator from Indiana states, that the etiquette of the Senate would require that a measure should not be considered in the absence of the Senator who proposed it; but I do not think that Senator will take any very great offense on the subject of etiquette if the measure that he is in favor of meets with a favorable solution during his absence. I do not think he will complain of it; and, therefore, if we can bring this matter to a close by making joint action upon the two cases, I am in hopes the Senate will do it.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Oregon when he supposes that this rule has been universal. Such is not the fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said that, so far as I had been able to examine the precedents and so far as they are contained in this report, the rule has been what I stated. If there is any other precedent I have been unable to find it.

Mr. WHYTE. I will call the Senator's attention to the case of Governor Thomas. Governor Thomas was not allowed one dollar of compensation by the Senate of the United States for contesting his right to a seat in this body for a year. So far from it, the State of Maryland paid him his expenses by a vote of the Legislature. Subsequently his successor in office received the pay from the commencement of the term. So the rule stated by the Senator from Oregon has not been a rule universal in its application.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would inquire of the Senator from Maryland the reason why Thomas was not paid?

Mr. WHYTE. I am only speaking of the fact, not the reason. He was here for a year, denied a right to the seat. His successor was elected, and his successor received pay from the commencement of the term.

Mr. MITCHELL. But does the Senator know of any special reason having been assigned by the United States Senate at that time why they would not treat him as they treated others?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why was he not admitted to his seat?

Mr. WHYTE. That is another matter.

Mr. MORTON. There were two reasons, if I remember correctly. One was that there was never any application made here for the pay of Governor Thomas, so far as I know. Was there?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know.

Mr. MORTON. That was a pretty good reason. The other one was that Governor Thomas was rejected because he was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment, and came here in violation and defiance of that amendment. That I think would have been another reason if the application had been made; but the first one I should think would be satisfactory.

Mr. WEST. That rule was applied to all Senators who were ineligible. The Senators from Arkansas who came here in 1866 got no compensation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the instance cited by the Senator from Maryland is applicable, because Mr. Thomas was held to be ineligible. I did not think so at the time and I voted for his admission, because I thought he was eligible; but the Senate decided that he was ineligible, and therefore he did not come within the rule. So far as my experience goes—I never have examined the subject—but my recollection is that any man who was eligible, and who came here in good faith to contest a seat, has been allowed the pay and compensation of a Senator from the time of his election until the decision of his case. I do not think that it is altogether a good rule. I think that in many cases when contestants are subjected to very little expense, and when the delay is very long, it is hardly good administration to pay them the entire compensation. But if there is to be any variation from the rule, it should be by a declaratory resolution, and not by making a point upon an existing case.

This is a case which is exceedingly meritorious. There can be no doubt that the contestant in this case considered himself, and had a good right to consider himself, entitled to the seat. He was elected by the body which had been recognized both in Louisiana and in Washington, and he received the votes of a very large number, indeed, of almost a majority of the Senate. It is not, therefore, I think, one of those extreme cases upon which the rule should be varied. I would rather have varied it in the case of a Senator from Georgia—I have forgotten his name—who came here and after a service of some eight or ten days received more than that many thousand dollars. The question was raised then, but it was said this was according to the invariable rule of the Senate.

After this question shall have been disposed of, I think it would be well to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections the propriety of passing some resolution on the subject, or some law on the subject, or some rule of the Senate, as I think has been done in the other House of Congress; so that there shall be a fair compensation paid to a contestant, but not necessarily the entire pay of a member of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Committee on Privileges and Elections whether Mr. Pinchback also received compensation from the House of Representatives while he was contesting a right to a seat there? He was contesting for a seat in the House of Representatives at the same time that he was contesting for a seat here. Whether the House of Representatives paid him or not, I am unable to say. I remember the case of an applicant, not Mr. Pinchback, who prosecuted two contests, one at this end and the other at the other end of the Capitol, and was paid at both ends. I should like to know whether that is the case in this instance.

Mr. MORTON. I do not believe it is at all. Mr. Pinchback was elected, as was supposed, as Congressman at large from Louisiana, and was afterward elected to the Senate; but he did not get either place. I think he never preferred any claim—I never heard of any—for pay in the House.

Mr. DAWES. I did not make the inquiry because I had any suspicion on that point; but, if that were so, everybody, I think, would say that the sum paid there should be deducted from this allowance. As I voted against the admission of Mr. Pinchback to a seat here, believing that he was not entitled to it, perhaps I may be indulged in making a remark or two on this resolution.

I shall vote for the resolution. I shall vote for it upon this ground, that it is according to what, as near as I can learn, has been the unbroken precedent of the Senate. I had occasion yesterday to give a little history of this rule in the House, and if it would not be repeating perhaps it would be well enough to restate it in some particulars. This same rule applied in the House, without exception as I stated yesterday, up to the time that the per diem was exchanged for a fixed salary; and afterward through the period that the $3,000 salary was paid and after the $5,000 salary was paid for some time, until the cases became very marked where men would prosecute a contest to a seat and there was no great disposition to press the contest. The cases would run along through the long session very many of them, and then upon the final vote the contestants would get a very large sum of money. It was an evil, and the application of the rule here is an evil. I think the rule adopted by the House afterward is the only true rule; that is, every person who prosecutes a claim for a seat in either branch should, as an encouragement to prosecute any claim that is entertained in good faith and he has reason to believe is an honest claim, be assured, in the interest of honest election, in the interest of the purity of the ballot-box, and in the interest of those who have a right to be represented by men of their own choice, that, so far as the burden of asserting the rights of his constituents is concerned, it should not rest on his shoulders, but he should be paid only his fair and necessary expenses. But, sir, in my opinion it should not be a means of obtaining money for any other purpose than defraying those expenses. That rule, so far as it has been acted upon in the other branch, has had a beneficial effect. A man has every encouragement that he ought to have to assert his honest claim and the honest claim of his constituents of which they are likely to be deprived; but no man under that rule is encouraged to make this a means of obtaining money. But the rule has not obtained here; and in this case, so peculiar, I am not willing myself to make an exception of this man. I would rather begin from and after this to adopt a new rule than to have it said that it broke upon us in the Senate in regard to this peculiar case.

There is another feature of the law which I hope this committee, if the Senate charge them with reviewing the matter at all, will look into. I understand the construction of the law in this branch and in the other branch is that, if a man should be elected to fill out the unexpired remaining months of the six-years term which Mr. Pinchback claimed, the moment he is admitted here, he is entitled to the full salary back to the beginning of the term. Such is the construction put upon the statute in the other branch, and so I understand it to be here. That is all wrong; it ought not to be.

But, sir, for the reason I have stated, I am going to vote to compensate Mr. Pinchback according to the established precedents of the Senate, because I believe (though perhaps not quite as strongly) with those who voted for his admission that he prosecuted his claim in good faith. I believe that, from his stand-point and from the stand-point of those who supported him, he had reason to think that his case was a good one. I could not see it so; but I am not going to say that, prosecuting it as he did, he shall be excepted from the general rule. It was not his fault that it was not decided in nine months or in a year or in two years. If it was postponed three years, or whatever time, it was not at his solicitation, and therefore it should not be laid to his door that the amount of money thus drawn is unusually large.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to have a vote on this matter. I think it can be disposed of now without any further discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SARGENT. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. WINDOM. I will not object if the right to call for the regular order is reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be understood.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, I am not one of those who have a very great veneration for precedents. I hold that each Senator should stand upon his own judgment on every case that is presented to him, and if errors are detected in the administration of the Government in any of its Departments, however long precedents may have cooperated in continuing those errors, they should be stricken at. The precedent here claimed, however, has not always obtained as to the payment to claimants of seats in this body and in the other House. I have a very lively remembrance of 1865. I remember that under the proclamation of the President Legislatures were elected in the Southern States, and they were instructed by the President to send forward their Senators and Representatives to Congress. Those governments were recognized by the President; those State Legislatures were recognized by all the departments of the Government; they were State Legislatures that passed laws that have not yet been repealed. But when they sent forward their Senators and Representatives to Congress they were kept waiting here for a year and more upon the question of their admission, and they were finally turned away, and I have not up to this time ascertained that precedent has sufficed to give them one dollar of money in consideration of the service they attempted to perform at that time. I speak knowingly on this subject, because I stood just outside yonder door for a year and a half with a commission in my pocket from a State Legislature, signed by a governor recognized by every department of this Government, and I was finally, as I say, with others, turned away and told we could not come in at all; we had no right to representation here.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was not a case of a contest.

Mr. ALCORN. It was a case of a contest, for we were contesting our right to seats here all the while.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question was whether the State was entitled to representation at that time.

Mr. ALCORN. That was precisely the question with regard to Pinchback, as I understand. It was a question as to whether the State was in a condition to elect a Senator. The Senate has decided that it was not.

Now I intend to vote for this resolution, but I intend to vote for it precisely for the opposite reason to that given by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He says that he voted against the admission of Pinchback because he did not think he was entitled to be admitted to his seat.

I voted for the admission of Pinchback, believing him to be entitled to the seat, and for that reason alone I shall vote to pay him this compensation. I leave the logic of the two positions to be considered by those who may think them worthy of consideration.

I have not, however, understood the precedents of the Senate to be as stated by some Senators. I think the Senator from Massachusetts stated that it had been the precedent when a Senator was elected to fill out an unexpired term to give him full compensation from the beginning of that term. If this be true, I am greatly behind the times. If such a precedent as that does prevail, I say it is unjust, and every Senator should stand ready to strike that precedent down. It is founded on no principle of justice, upon none of logic or reason; but it rests for its foundation upon the principles of injustice and wrong. Not aware of any such precedent and holding the ideas of a man who was uncultivated in the arts of diplomatic legislation, when I came here a year after my term had begun, not having taken my seat for a year after I had been elected to the Senate, I claimed only compensation, as an honest man, from the day that I arrived and was sworn in as a Senator and took my seat. I did not think I was entitled to any more. I should vote against giving any Senator or any Representative any compensation that he may have waived by reason of his absence.

If the reasons which are assigned by Senators are sufficient, there is no question with regard to the passage of this resolution. One Senator gives as his reason that he voted against Pinchback's admission because he did not believe he was entitled to his seat; and for that reason he votes to pay him the compensation. I take it that that will be the judgment of one class of Senators. Another class vote for it because they believed he was entitled to the seat because the Legislature of the State of Louisiana was recognized by every department of this Government, because the Legislature of the State of Louisiana that elected Pinchback was recognized by the people of the State of Louisiana without regard to party, acquiescing, continuing in force the laws that were passed by that Legislature, because of the fact that one of the seats of Louisiana in the Senate has been vacant for all this period of time and in violation of that provision of the Constitution which declares that no State shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent. These are the reasons why I shall vote for this resolution.

But I rose to say and intended when I rose to say no more than that; that I have no regard for precedents which are not founded in reason and in justice; and whenever a precedent is cited here that rests not upon justice, not upon logic, not upon law, but upon error and wrong to the people whom we represent, I shall vote against following it.

Mr. WINDOM. I think we ought to finish the sundry civil appropriation bill. This matter seems likely to give rise to long speeches, and we are near the close of the appropriation bill.

Mr. MORTON. I think we can dispose of this in a few minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. We can take the vote now.

Mr. WINDOM. If there can be a vote taken, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. On the passage of this resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator if he wishes to make a speech, unless it is to be one of considerable length, and if so, we ought to finish the appropriation bill, so that it may go to a committee of conference.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire this resolution to pass without expressing my views upon it, at what length I cannot say, except that I have made no preparation, and I would as lief say what I have to say now as at any other time.

Mr. WINDOM. I shall have to ask then for the regular order. An unprepared speech, although a good one, is usually the longest.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the Senator in regard to this question that I merely desire to discharge my own conscience on this subject, not in the least to delay the action of the Senate. Of course I have very decided views on this resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly have not the slightest objection to the Senator making a speech on this question; but it seems to me the sundry civil bill should go to a committee of conference to-day, and the resolution can be postponed until afterward. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will allow the sundry civil bill to go over and let us take a vote on the resolution. It has been delayed a good while on one account and another, and there will be ample time to consider the appropriation bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not feel like taking the responsibility of permitting the appropriation bill to lie over. I do not urge it myself; I submit the question to the Senate, and am willing to determine it on a rising vote as to whether we shall go on with the appropriation bill or not.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will allow the sundry civil bill to be passed over informally until we dispose of this resolution, and then let the appropriation bill come up. I think we can finish the other matter very easily. The Senate will have to stay for the appropriation bill; but after the appropriation bill is passed they will scatter.

JACKSON TIBBETTS.

Mr. HOWE. During this colloquy I ask unanimous consent to recommit to the Committee on Claims the petition of Jackson Tibbetts, and others, employés of L. J. & J. Day and T. W. Call, late contractors on the improvement of the Fox River, Wisconsin, praying that the amount ferfeited to the United States by the contractors by the annulment of their contracts be applied to the payment of wages due these employés. It was reported adversely on Wednesday last. I was not present when the report was made; and in order that it may get on the Calendar in the form of a bill, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 429) for the relief of Charles C. Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the House joint resolution No. 139 relative to furloughing employés.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator ought not to make that request under the circumstances. I am asking for another matter to go over.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think this will lead to any discussion.

Mr. WINDOM. Let us dispose of the appropriation bill first.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senate will agree to take up the joint resolution and act on it without reference to a committee I have no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator wish it taken from the table merely for reference?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. I desire to have it put upon its passage.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the resolution?

Mr. LOGAN. It is a joint resolution giving leave of absence to the employés of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. ANTHONY. And giving them pay?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. For how long?

Mr. LOGAN. For twenty days.

Mr. WINDOM. That will give rise to discussion.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. In the hope of reconciling this difference between these two Senators, I beg to present a memorial. I present a memorial numerously signed by merchants and others in Boston, remonstrating against the amendment to the shipping act. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the National Board of Trade, praying that silver coin be not made a legal tender for any sum exceeding $5; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota insists on the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the Senator from Minnesota will be willing to take a rising vote as to whether we shall go on with the Pinchback resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. I think we ought to finish the appropriation bill. I was some time ago ready to take a vote on the question, but I insist on taking up the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota insists on the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I hope this matter will be laid over informally and taken up when the appropriation bill is finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks that the Pinchback resolution be laid aside informally until the sundry civil appropriation bill is concluded.

Mr. KELLY. I shall object to laying aside the resolution informally. I have another matter which I wish to call up.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will allow this matter to go forward a little while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has objected. There is no unanimous consent to having the resolution laid aside informally until the present bill is concluded.

Mr. SARGENT. The regular order is called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota demands the regular order, which is the sundry civil appropriation bill.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. Pending the consideration of the regular order, I ask leave to make a report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

WM. WINDOM,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
A. T. CAPERTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. A. J. SPARKS,
S. A. HURLBUT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state briefly the ground of the disagreement between the two committees. It was wholly with reference to the third section of the bill, which provides for the abolition of the Indian Bureau and for the performance of the duties of that Bureau by the War Department, the House insisting upon the section, or upon another which should provide for a transfer, and the committee of the Senate not feeling at liberty under the action of the Senate to accept the proposition. Therefore it was disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a further conference.

Mr. SARGENT. Which House granted the conference?

Mr. WINDOM. The Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate insist upon its amendment and ask for another conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Chair was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. CAPERTON were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAPERTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 966) establishing a post-route in West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 967) to authorize permission by the Secretary of War to propagate lobsters at the rocks of the Ripraps, in Hampton Roads, Virginia, for a limited period; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 968) authorizing the district and circuit court to be held at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, insisted on by the Senate, to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. O. R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. CHARES FOSTER of Ohio managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House has passed a bill (H. R. No. 3839) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NORWOOD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, the question being on the amendment of Mr. WINDOM to insert after line 886:

The appropriation of $8,000 made last year to defray the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President under a joint resolution of Congress to represent the United States in an international penitentiary congress is hereby made available, agreeably to the intent of the act making the appropriation for the payment of all necessary expenses incurred in the preliminary labors connected with the preparation for the congress; and further, as the said congress has, for the purpose of a more thorough preparation, been postponed for a year beyond the time originally fixed for holding it, to wit, 1876, therefore the appropriation referred to above is hereby continued in force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, or until the said international penitentiary congress shall have completed its labors.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, there is a division of opinion in the Committee on Appropriations upon this proposition. Some members of the committee consider that the appropriation ought not to be made. I am of that number. The amendment is not printed in the bill, but was offered by a member of the committee. As the amendment reads it would seem to imply that it was the first appropriation made for this object. I think it is the average opinion of the Senate that this sum of $8,000 is a new item appropriated last year, which on account of some accident was not used, or a part of it was not used, and which ought to be made available for another year. It is worth while sometimes to know the history of such things in order to see whether they are lingering, long drawn out, or whether they are novel propositions of value to which the Government exceptionably should give its aid.

I have nothing to say with reference to the gentleman who, for a number of years past, has ably represented this subject and who procured an appropriation from Congress. I think he is a very worthy gentleman. I have his acquaintance and have always understood, and from my own observation applied to him believe, that he is a very worthy man. If we were simply to appropriate because worthy men ask for it we would sustain the churches of the land, because there are so many worthy clergymen; we would sustain a great many enterprises because those who foster and promote them are worthy and excellent men. But that is not sufficient for us.

I have nothing to say against the object for which this appropriation is asked. I say appropriation, because to-day at noon it lapsed into the Treasury of the United States. If it is taken out, it will be taken out wholly as it was by the original appropriation bill. But if it shall seem that some years ago a very fine, thin entering-wedge was inserted into the Treasury of the United States, that the President of the United States was authorized to appoint a commissioner to a prison commission or congress in London with the express declaration on the part of Congress that there should be no cost to the Government whatever, that nothing should be charged either for salary or for expenses, and that that was the beginning of it, and we were subsequently compelled to pay both salary and expenses, and are again to revive the whole thing here again, it seems to me it takes away the idea of novelty, a great deal of the freshness of the subject.

I call the attention of Senators to the history of this matter. I am familiar with it because it is an old snag in the Committee on Appropriations in both Houses. In the seventeenth volume of the United States Statutes at Large, at page 21, will be found this resolution:

A resolution authorizing the appointment of a commissioner to an international congress on penitentiary and reformatory discipline.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commissioner to attend an international congress on penitentiary and reformatory discipline, proposed to be held in Europe; but the said appointment shall not authorize any expenditure of money from the Treasury for salary or expenses, and must be accepted upon this express condition.

It was said when that resolution was passed, "We merely want to give an official character to this individual; we want to have some proper gentleman selected who can go forward clothed with the commission of the Government of the United States; but we will not ask you to pay any expense or any salary; this is a humanitarian work; certain gentleman in the various States are interested in prison reform, and they would like to confer with those in Europe. It is thought that somewhere in Europe a convention of this kind will be held, called a congress, and we want to send some one of our number there at our expense for that purpose." Congress passed the resolution in the form in which I have read it. It was a very thin edge of a wedge, was it not? I suppose the idea of Congress was that that meant something; that when we put in that express condition, and said "You shall not come to us either for salary or expenses," it was to be a contract and that we should not be asked for it. What was the fact? Congress is unsophisticated in these matters, or rather it forgets from year to year, and somebody has to perform the painful task of recalling to the minds of Senators the facts, when persons come here and make an agreement and have it put in a law, and we forget all about it and are ready for the next proposition in their interest. This resolution was passed March 20, 1871. At the next Congress, in 1872, on page 368 of the same volume, is found printed:

For expenses of United States commissioner to the international penitentiary congress at London, in 1872, $5,000.

There was no law authorizing it; the law prohibited it in fact; but it was got through here by the most persistent lobbying that ever a small item received. It was got through and Congress supposed then that they had got rid of the subject. Five thousand dollars was appropriated, although not a dollar authorized by law. Had we got through with it? After we had appropriated this liberal sum, for so it looked, the next year they said: "We were compelled to subscribe for books and we want Congress to pay for them." I remember that it was a matter of considerable demurrer, but they said: "This closes it up and here you have our report. You ought to allow us this; we had to do like other delegates, subscribe for those reports of the commissioners; we had to do that, and of course we could not afford to pay it out of the $5,000."

Consequently, to get rid of the matter, in 1873 we made this further appropriation:

To pay for five hundred copies of the proceedings of the international reform congress which assembled in London, July, 1872, for the use of the commissioner of the United States at said congress, $1,500.

There, to get rid of the matter, as we hoped, under legislation which said there should not be a dollar paid, and legislation enacted only on an express condition which puts somebody on their obligations of honor that it should not be asked for, we bought these five hundred copies. I know that some of us felt a breath of relief then and thought "we have done taking money out of the Treasury for this purpose and this company of gentlemen." We had the report printed, and here it is, a very good report unquestionably, containing some excellent essays by different persons, some of them with titles. It seems to cover the whole subject. I do not know anything required to be done by another congress if there is one; and it seems there has not been one, and the man wandered all over Europe and did not find one. If the next one assembles it would only have to chew this [holding up the report] a little finer. There cannot be any great advance in prison science in a couple of years. Is this so soon worthless and to be superseded? But—

If I am to be so soon done for
What was I begun for?

See how broad is the range of this volume. Chapter 1 treats of the prison systems in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, and the German Empire, Baden, Bavaria, Prussia, Saxony, Würtemberg, Italy, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Russia, Switzerland, Sweden, United States, England, Ireland. Essays upon them all. They are all discussed. If anybody wants information let them get it here. Why need we have another book on the subject?

Chapter 2 treats of prison administration in all the different States which I have mentioned. Another branch of the subject, chapter 3, treats of prison discipline in all the States, the subject being elaborated very carefully. Next, "moral and religious agencies." Next, "scholastic education" in all these countries. Next, "prison labor." Next, "sanitary condition of prisons." Next, "reformatory results." Then, "prison officers, their qualifications and training." Then essays upon "sentences" of prisoners. Then, upon "imprisonment for debt." Then, "causes of crime, liberated prisoners, suggestions relating to reforms, juvenile reformatories, state of prisons in British possessions, India, Ceylon, Jamaica, Victoria." Then we come to part second of the work of the congress: "The prisoner after arrest and before conviction," "The prisoner during his incarceration," essays by Sir John Bowring, by M. Vaucher Crémieux, by Mr. Stevens, by Dr. Mowatt, by Mr. Peterson of Norway, by Mr. Leavitt, by Mrs. Jauney, by Colonel Colville, by Dr. Frey, by General Pilsbury, by Professor Foynitsky, by Mr. Hill, and by Baron Von Holtzendorff.

I read these names to show that eminent men have contributed to the sum of knowledge which goes to make up this volume. I will not go further through the table of contents, but it runs for pages, and the book is filled with much valuable matter, carefully compiled in this same way. What is it to be good for? Is it to be set aside by a subsequent Congress? Is it of no value, provided the convention had met in Rome; and if any convention had met in Rome would it not have been that Mr. Foynitsky, or some other gentleman would have written some essays, and praised the modes proposed by his predecessor, or differed with him?

In other words, I ask if it is practicable, and do we need to pay thousands and thousands of dollars for books which we already have, containing ample information on this subject, and information in fact which is too little used in our own system?

I say we thought we had concluded this matter after we had paid the last expenses that could be trumped up against the United States and received the report, and, whatever was to be printed, printed by the order of Congress. Unfortunately Congress had not got rid of the subject. Monsieur Tonson came again, and, having managed to get that matter carefully cleared up, he comes at us again by another joint resolution, which was passed by Congress, where nothing is said about expenses or salary. A very mild-mannered resolution comes next, out of which there was carefully eliminated all these conditions by which we had made it a point of honor they would not ask for any money—an express condition that we should not pay any money. All that was left out in the new scheme, and why was it done? It was just as well to have left in the conditions. Such stipulations are idle. They are ignored or forgotten. The effort to enforce them is vain. It is like whistling down the wind; it is wasting breath. Now, in 1875, coming along in due order after the other had been cleaned up, the following resolution was passed by Congress:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commissioner to attend the international penitentiary congress proposed to be held next year at Rome.

This was passed February 6, 1875. If that resolution had said, "and the sum of $8,000 is hereby appropriated to pay all the expenses of said commissioners, or salary of said commissioners," do you suppose it would have passed? O, no; I have no idea that it would have passed. It might possibly have done so, but it would have been only after a close fight; but they again got the little end of the wedge in and were ready to drive it in to the head. They made their campaign as they did before, and they had learned a little in disembarrassing themselves from the terms of the previous resolution; and it required but little lobbying to get through a resolution which would be pretty much the same thing in the end. What did we do? In the sundry civil bill in that year, after the passage of the resolution, it was urged upon the committee and upon Congress, "this resolution creates an obligation and we must appropriate the amount and pay the expenses of this commission." I know that I did not think so at the time. I know that I objected to it. In the first place, it was not certain there was going to be any congress, and the subsequent result showed it, because our commissioner went "prospecting" around, as we say in California, the continent of Europe to find a congress and could not find any. He comes in now and asks that part of this money be paid for his preliminary expenses in trying to find a congress; and I will show that is exactly what this resolution means. He did not find any congress, and now he comes back and says, "Pay me for that, and let me have the balance of it, although it has gone into the Treasury, to go and find one next year."

Here is the last appropriation which was made:

That the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, to pay the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President under a joint resolution approved February 16, 1875, to attend the international penitentiary congress to be held next year at Rome.

The time has elapsed and there has been no congress, and the money has gone into the Treasury, but they come here now, and in accordance with the tactics that have distinguished this thing from the start, and with a zeal and industry worthy of another cause, they insist that we must re-appropriate this money; that there is some obligation devolved upon us that we should do it, or else their argument is that there is some public benefit to be derived from it. I say there is no obligation upon us so far. We did not authorize the commissioner to go and try to find a congress. He ought not to have gone on a search after a congress when he had no notification that there was one. And there is no public benefit in the matter. The previous report gives all the details and all the information which the public can digest for the next five years. But they come in now and say in this amendment—

The appropriation of $8,000, made last year to defray the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President, under a joint resolution of Congress, to represent the United States in an international penitentiary congress, is hereby made available, agreeably to the intent of the act making the appropriation for the payment of all necessary expenses incurred in the preliminary labors connected with the preparation for the congress.

Those are very strange words, "incurred in the preliminary labors connected with the preparation for the congress," and as it was explained in the debate, it means he tried to find a congress and could not find one. That was a preliminary labor in preparing for the congress! I do not think it is good logic, and I do not think it is good morals. I say again this person should have waited and found out before he went and tried to find it, and we ought not to pay for that at any rate. Then it goes on:

And further, as the said congress has, for the purpose of a more thorough preparation, been postponed for a year beyond the time originally fixed for holding it, to wit, 1876, therefore the appropriation referred to above is hereby continued in force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, or until the said international penitentiary congress shall have completed its labors.

That is to say, it is a permanent appropriation, to run forever. That last line throws a suspicion upon the fact whether there is any penitentiary congress to meet in the fiscal year to end in 1877 or the fiscal year to end in 1878, or any time that is known. It may be one, ten, or twenty years from now. If so, this will hold on until that time. It is careless legislation. The probability is that there is no such congress in view; but there may be one, and there will be an opportunity for some gentlemen under it to go to Europe and meet counts and dukes, &c., and enjoy refined society in Europe. My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] suggests that keeping this money in hand would be like buying an old door-plate because your daughter might marry a man who would have the same name as the one on it, and it would be convenient to have it in the house for that purpose. I think Toodles inspired my friend with the illustration. But that is the spirit of the legislation. It is to be held forever, and it implies there is nothing fixed or settled about there being a penitentiary congress this year or even the next.

I say this is not a proper way to use the money of the United States. I think there is a personal obligation devolving upon each Senator within the limits of justice to be careful with the money of the United States. This money, this $8,000, is not a very great sum to the Treasury. It would be a large sum in our individual pockets; it is something in the Treasury of the United States, and the aggregates of $8,000 make enormous amounts.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that this amendment makes it a continuous appropriation?

Mr. SARGENT. It makes a permanent appropriation, because it provides that it shall not lapse into the Treasury until that congress meets.

Mr. LOGAN. And there is no time appointed for it to meet?

Mr. SARGENT. I reason from it, the Senator will allow me to explain——

Mr. LOGAN. I understood the Senator to say that it was a permanent appropriation.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that we passed a resolution for the congress in the fiscal year ending 1876 and none met, they say because they were not ready, and now they want to make more ample preparations. Therefore a provision is put in "for the one to be held in the year ending June 30, 1877, and if not then, whenever it does meet." That is the effect of it. It is a permanent appropriation.

Mr. LOGAN. The reason I asked the question is that I voted for the amendment last night, but if it proposes to do what the Senator says, unless I get light from the other side, I shall change my vote. I asked the question for that purpose, to know whether that is the effect of it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is matter of inference on my part, but I give the Senate the ground of my inference, that the concluding words of the amendment go to show that there is no certainty that there will be any such congress within a year or two, and this amendment provides that the appropriation shall be available "until the said international penitentiary congress shall have completed its labors." Of course it must meet for that purpose. If there ever should be one the money will be very handy, and it is to be kept for that purpose in the Treasury. I think for that reason we ought not to adopt the amendment. I think if we cannot save at the bung-hole, we might at least try to save at the spigot.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am a little surprised at the statements of the Senator from California. I ask what his information is that this measure has been carried by lobbying and by other unworthy measures?

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say anything about unworthy measures.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is unworthy.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator think so? I think that if a person wishes to have a measure pass Congress he has a right to suggest it. I do say that gentlemen have been brought on here from New York for the very purpose of recommending this matter to the Committee on Appropriations year after year. That is lobbying; and if it is unworthy, it is the fact.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am a little surprised to hear the Senator from California state before the country that an association such as that we are now considering has, to use his term, gained this appropriation by lobbying and by tactics. I have never been spoken to by a member of this association, that I am aware of, until the last day or two. I believe that not until yesterday, when this matter was up, was I spoken to by Mr. Wines, the commissioner. A gentleman of this Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, handed me a communication from Governor Seymour, which was laid before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that is the only possible influence that has ever been produced to affect my judgment in any way.

Further, the president of this association is Mr. Horatio Seymour. Is he a lobbyist? A vice-president of this association is the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN;] another one is the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] all interested in this measure. Do they carry measures through this Senate by misrepresentation, lobbying, and tactics?

My friend from California asked me last night to withdraw this amendment for fear that pressing it would break up a quorum. I was not at liberty to do that, because it was not in my power. Any personal sacrifice I could have made to accommodate the Senator, I would most cheerfully have complied with. It seems as if the Senator was punishing this measure because of my disobedience to him.

Mr. President, this congress as I am informed has representatives from every country in the world excepting Portugal. I am informed that the commissions are paid by those countries. They have accomplished, I believe, a great good, although I have not a great deal of information on that subject, never having had anything to do with the congress. We are told that nothing has been done. Let me say that there was a congress held in London in 1872; there was a commission appointed consisting, I think, of nineteen or twenty representatives of different countries, and in 1874 they met at Brussels; in 1875 they met at some place in Germany, I do not remember its name. They then made the appointment that the next congress should be held in Rome; but for some reason, probably, as I understand, on account of the consideration of health, it was determined to adjourn that to Stockholm, where the next congress is to be held.

Now, the Senator from California says this is a permanent appropriation. This appropriation, if I understand it, is for two purposes. It is in part to pay money which has been already expended under the faith of the act of 1875, which reads in this wise:

That the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated to pay the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President under a joint resolution approved February 16, 1875, to attend the international penitentiary congress to be held next year at Rome.

I understand that for going to Europe and for various other expenses preparatory to that congress, for gathering information, some two or three thousand dollars of the $8,000 have been expended but not drawn from the Treasury, and that no other money will be drawn from the Treasury unless it is to meet the expenses of a congress to be held. If there is no congress, no draught will be made upon the Treasury; and therefore my friend from Illinois was not, as I understand, misinformed by anything that was said yesterday.

Mr. President, it seems to me, although I am not very familiar with the subject and have never taken any interest in it, that to render imprisonment reformatory and profitable to society is a subject worthy of the attention of the best men of our country, and some little expense is incident to so worthy a work, and I believe that it comes back to the nation a thousandfold. Such has been the experience in the State of New Jersey. By the reformatory measures, introduced first by Miss Dix, our expenses have been lessened, reformation has been much more successfully effected, and great good comes to society. Now here is $8,000 which covers a period of two or three years, only $3,000 of it expended, and the rest not to be expended unless it be to meet the expense of the congress.

I ask that the communication which is the basis of this application made by the president of the association, Governor Seymour, be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL PRISON ASSOCIATION,
320 Broadway, New York, May 29, 1876.

SIR: The undersigned has the honor to submit to you the following statement, with a request that you will lay the same before the House of Representatives:

At the instance of the National Prison Association of the United States, Congress at its last session passed a joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a commissioner to represent the United States in an international penitentiary congress, at that time expected to convene in one of the capitals of Europe in 1876. At the same session Congress also appropriated $8,000 to meet the expenses of the said commissioner in the fulfillment of his mission. Rev. Dr. Wines, secretary of the National Prison Association, was made commissioner by the President, as he had previously been in 1871, to represent the Government in a similar congress to be convened the following year (1872) in London. On that occasion, with a commission from the President and letters from the Secretary of State, Dr. Wines visited Europe in 1871, and negotiated in reference to the objects of his mission with all the European governments, the greater part in person and the others through the United States ministers accredited to them.

The expenses incurred in this preliminary work of 1871, as well as those incident to his attendance on the congress in 1872, were defrayed by the Government.

The same service of preliminary preparation given to the first congress by the United States commissioner was desired and expected from him with respect to the second by the friends of the cause on both sides of the Atlantic. It was with reference to these extended services that the appropriation of $8,000 was made, as so large a sum would not have been needed for a mere attendance upon the congress. Unfortunately, however, the wording of the item introduced into the sundry civil appropriation bill was simply to the effect that such a sum should be "appropriated to meet the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President to represent the United States in the international penitentiary congress," &c. When applied to for an advance, to meet the preliminary expenses, the Secretary of State declined to make such advance, on the ground that, looking at the terms of the appropriation, he could not find the authority for such use of any part of the money appropriated.

Believing an early renewal of the labors of Dr. Wines abroad in preparation of the approaching, as of the previous, congress essential to the success desired and expected for it, a number of the members of the National Prison Association advanced the funds necessary to meet his expenses, in the belief that Congress would, by additional legislation intended to explain and perfect that of last year, make the appropriation applicable to the work of preparation as well as to that of actual attendance upon the congress.

At the meeting of the permanent international penitentiary commission, of which Dr. Wines is president, last year, at Bruchsal, it was resolved, for purposes of more thorough preparation, to postpone the convening of the congress till 1877. In view of this fact, in order to render the appropriation available even for the purpose of attendance on the congress, it will be necessary to continue it in force for another year.

Therefore, in the name of the National Prison Association of the United States, that originated and organized this whole movement from which such wide and signally beneficial results have already accrued, I respectfully ask of Congress the supplementary legislation indicated in this communication. It is not any new appropriation that is prayed for, but simply such legislative action as will give to an appropriation already made the direction and force intended, and continue it in vigor till it shall have accomplished its entire purpose.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

HORATIO SEYMOUR,
President National Prison Association.

Hon. MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CRAGIN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the five-minute rule be applied to this bill hereafter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out commencing with the word "or" in the next to the last line and all following that, namely:

Or until the said international penitentiary congress shall have completed its labors.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What are the words preceding?

The CHIEF CLERK. "Is hereby continued in force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If I am at liberty I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Randolph, West, Windom, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Dennis, Eaton, Kelly, Key, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Withers—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bruce, Burnside, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, and Wallace—34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to insert this amendment after line 806:

For constructing a signal-light on the crib in Lake Michigan in front of the city of Chicago, $5,000.

I desire only a moment to explain the amendment. The House of Representatives some time ago passed a bill appropriating this amount of money for this purpose. It came here and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce not having a quorum, since that time have failed to report the bill, although I mentioned it several times to members of the committee. I do not know that there was any objection to it; but they had no quorum, and a few days ago other bills that have been referred to that committee granting appropriations were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but this bill was not.

This is a very proper thing to be done. The crib, as it is called, is a house built out in the lake some two and a half miles from the city, where the tunnel goes that conveys the water to the city, and in times of very heavy fog it stands out there so as to be in the way of vessels passing. The light that is desired to be placed upon this crib is to give notice to vessels that are pretty close to it so that they may pass into the harbor. The crib is right opposite the harbor, and it is very necessary that a light or something to give notice to vessels should be on the crib in times of very heavy fogs. The measure not having been reported by the Committee on Commerce or referred to the Committee on Appropriations, I have thought it proper to offer the amendment so that it may go on this bill. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations has several amendments which I should like to present now before any other amendments are presented.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to make a motion to reconsider a vote taken last night. Is there objection to my making the motion now?

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the motion being entered and being called up after we get through with the committee's amendments.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will state the motion now. I move to reconsider the vote by which the proposition to make a survey of the Mississippi River "from Cairo to New Orleans, together with its various outlets to the Gulf, with a view of ascertaining the most effectual means of protecting the alluvial lands bordering upon its banks from overflow," was stricken out last night on page 44.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 52, line 1266, I move to strike out the word "forty" and insert "sixteen." I hold in my hand a letter, which is of so remarkable a character that I desire to have it read, not only on account of its brevity and peculiarity, but for the encouragement of all future Cabinet officers.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, July 1, 1876.

SIR: I notice that the appropriation in the sundry civil bill for the "expenses of military convicts" is retained at $40,000, the original estimates.

In the revised estimates reported by Secretary Taft, this item was reduced from $40,000 to $16,000, as will be seen from the inclosed document, (House Executive Document No. 164,) pages 6 and 7, marked in blue pencil.

I would suggest that the appropriation be reduced to $16,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL rose.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope there will be no objection on the part of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was going to inquire what line and page of the bill this is in.

Mr. WINDOM. Page 52, line 1266. The amendment is to reduce the appropriation "for payment of costs and charges of State penitentiaries, for the care, clothing, maintenance, and medical attendance of United States military convicts confined in them," from $40,000 to $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 25, after line 586, I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to pay a balance of one month's rent of the building known as the Washington City Protestant Orphan Asylum, heretofore occupied for the use of the Department of State, being the rent due for the month of October, 1875, under the lease of the same, $1,000.

There is a deficiency in the appropriation, and this is to pay the contract price for rent. It is recommended by the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. Immediately following the amendment just adopted, I move to insert:

To enable the Postmaster-General to pay for not exceeding forty-three thousand copies quarterly of the United States Official Postal Guide, and for mailing the same, $30,000.

That is on the recommendation of the Post-Office Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 29, after line 701, I move to insert:

For completion of basement-story of the Post-Office Department building, $65,321.85.

There is a detailed statement of the expenditures necessary for the completion of that building in the possession of the committee, which I will not read unless desired.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. After line 949, on page 39, I move to insert:

Provided, That the superintendent of meters at the Capitol shall hereafter take the statement of the meters of the several Department buildings in the city of Washington and render to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department the consumption of gas each month in said buildings, respectively.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that legislation?

Mr. WINDOM. It is in the line of economy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 27, after line 638, I am instructed to offer the following:

For court-house and post-office building at Topeka, Kansas, $50,000; and the cost of said building shall not exceed the sum of $300,000.

I offer this amendment at the instance of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it is also agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations, the site having been already purchased for the building.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. After line 1245, page 51, I move the following amendment:

For preparing, engraving, and printing the cuts, charts, plates, and atlas-sheets for geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, $20,000.

I hold in my hand a recommendation from the Secretary of War for the appropriation mentioned. The work has been done and it is necessary in order to have the benefit from it that the results should be published. I do not ask to have the letter read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 25, after line 601, I move to add to the appropriation for the Reform School of the District of Columbia these words:

For erecting workshops, chimney, purchase of steam-engine, machinery, belting, and tools, $11,000.

Pay of engineer, $480.

For fencing, outbuildings, hedge, plants, and trees, $5,000.

For fuel, repairs of the buildings, conservatory, and stocking same, purchase of library, and cows, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer an amendment that involves no expenditure. On page 26, after line 622, I move to insert:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell at public auction, on such conditions of sale as he may deem best for the public service, the land and buildings belonging to the United States now occupied by the courts of the United States in Boston, and appropriate the money received therefor to the completion of the unfinished building for court-house, post-office, and subtreasury.

I will state that for the Boston court-house, subtreasury, and post-office building there has been land condemned that involves the amount of the appropriation made by the House. There is in process of condemnation by the courts a further quantity, making the whole sum $370,000; but we have thought we could wait until next December for the balance, and therefore do not propose any amendment to that portion of it; but there is a clause here appropriating $50,000 for the continuation and completion of the building, although $500,000 was estimated; and this $50,000 is absolutely indispensable to bring the building up above the surface of the street in order that it may be protected from frost. Now, in order to get a further sum for the continuation of the building, it is proposed to sell the present building, being the old Masonic temple on Tremont street, and appropriate the proceeds of that, when received, to the purpose of continuing this building, to which I think there will be no objection on the part of Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am also directed by the same committee to present the following amendment, to be inserted on page 39 after line 931:

For the naval monument the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose of completing the statue of "Peace," platform, steps, and circular basin of the naval monument contracted for by the officers of the Navy with Franklin Simmons, and placing the same on some appropriate part of the public grounds in Washington: Provided, That the Admiral of the Navy, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, are hereby appointed a committee to select and designate such place upon the public grounds for the erection of the said monument as in their judgment shall be most appropriate.

The substance of this proposition has already passed the Senate twice, once two years ago and again this past winter, and that bill has been or is to be reported, having been agreed upon by the committee of the House with amendments which are incorporated in this proposition; that is to say, the "Secretary of the Navy" has been changed to "the Admiral of the Navy" and the sum that was appropriated by the Senate bill has been reduced from $25,000 to $20,000, and upon examination it is believed that possibly that amount may be sufficient. Lest the appropriation might fail, it is deemed important by members not only of the Senate but of the House that the provision should be incorporated into this bill as the monument is already completed and waiting to be put up.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer an amendment, and I will accompany it with a couple of words. It is to insert—

That E. N. Atherton be placed on the rolls of the Senate as messenger acting assistant doorkeeper.

This gentleman has been here all winter receiving the pay of persons below that grade. I desire only that he shall have the pay given to other people doing the same duty that he performs.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I should like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is a very plain case, Mr. President. I am sure the Senator from South Carolina will vote for it. It is to pay a worthy man for the duty which he has been performing all this session at a much less compensation than other people get for doing the same duty.

Mr. CLAYTON. What duty?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Messenger here acting as doorkeeper. He waits on you every day.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. O, no.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think this is a very proper amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. We regulate our own messengers under our own rules. I do not think it ought to go in this bill. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania on reflection will insist on placing it here. Let it be done by our own separate action, if it is to be done at all.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hardly ever disagree with the Senator from Maine, and I am sure if he understood this case as I do he would not object.

Mr. HAMLIN. Probably I should not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Therefore I trust he will make no more objection. This is a worthy case for a worthy man, to pay him for just what he does. I trust it will go through.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not the slighest doubt in the world that if I understood it precisely as the Senator does, I should think precisely as he does; nor have I any doubt that if he viewed it as I do, he would think as I do. I think it does not belong on this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. But the Senator from Maine does not understand it, and I do. I trust we shall have the vote.

Mr. WINDOM. I trust those who understand it will vote for it, and those who do not understand it will vote against it; and I am sure a majority are in the latter class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. On behalf of the Library Committee, I move to amend this bill on the sixth page by inserting after line 127:

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ enough clerical force to complete the alphabetical index now in progress to the documents, debates, and laws of Congress, $4,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For preparing a complete index to the manuscripts and historical and military letters and papers in the Library of Congress, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Succeeding the amendment just made, I move to insert the following:

The unexpended balance of $1,000 appropriated by the act for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year 1875 to enable the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress to procure plans for the accommodation of the Library is hereby re-appropriated and made available for the same object.

Two years ago Congress appropriated $2,000 to prepare plans for enlarging the Capitol so as to provide for the Library of Congress. Plans were obtained; only $1,000 of the money was expended. Upon submission of those plans to Congress the Senate did not agree to the plan of making provision for the Library in the Capitol building. Recently we have had the Architect of the Treasury Department prepare designs for a separate building. There are a few hundred dollars required out of this thousand to pay the draughtsman for preparing those plans, and we wish to have so much of the balance of this appropriation applied to the payment of these bills as is required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend by inserting on page 12, after line 266:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay William J. McDonald, Chief Clerk of the Senate, for preparing, under a resolution of the Senate of 28th June 1876, a new edition of the Manual, $1,000.

Senators are aware, the new Senators especially are unpleasantly aware that this edition of our rules has been entirely exhausted and it is necessary to have more. I wished to get a copy the other day for a very distinguished person, a visitor here, and it was impossible to find one anywhere. We all ought to have some of them.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask whether there is anything necessary for the issue of another edition except printing? Is there any work required to be done, except printing?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is always some work required to be done, some revision, some change.

Mr. WITHERS. Have there been any such important changes in the rules since the last edition was issued as to require any considerable amount of editorial labor to prepare the new edition?

Mr. ANTHONY. It requires not a very great amount of editorial labor to the very accomplished parliamentarian who has to do it; but it would be a great deal of work for an inexperienced person.

Mr. WITHERS. I only inquired for information. I am answered.

Mr. ANTHONY. As a lawyer sometimes says, "I do not charge $50 or $100"—I beg pardon for mentioning so small a sum in this presence—"I do not charge a thousand dollars for doing this, but for knowing how to do it." I think it is what we have usually appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following, to come in immediately after the amendment just adopted:

The Congressional Printer shall cause 25,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1875 to be printed for the use of the Commissioner; also 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the use of the Commissioner.

The Committee on Printing have reported a resolution of this character. It requires no appropriation; it will be paid out of the appropriation already made in this bill for the public printing; but the number of copies that we give to the Commissioner of Agriculture and to the Commissioner of Education for distribution is a part of the machinery of their offices. It is hardly practicable for them to carry on their offices, to get the information which is necessary to make up their reports, unless they can make this trifling return to their correspondents. We receive bimonthly reports on the condition of the crops of this country from the Commissioner of Agriculture. He must have thousands of correspondents to send him the information from which those reports are made up. They generally do it as a labor of love, but he returns to them, and all the compensation he makes them is a copy of this book, which costs forty cents. I have dropped out of this proposition, where it does not belong, the wider question of printing these books for popular distribution. I hope that, relieved from that, this amendment may be adopted.

Mr. PADDOCK. When the Senator some time ago reported the resolution to which he refers, which was substantially the same proposition as the amendment that he now offers to this bill, I offered an amendment to that resolution authorizing the printing of a certain number of thousands of copies for the use of Senators and members of the House of Representatives for distribution to their constituencies.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will bring that up at another time and let it be disposed of on its merits. I think that among those who believe that these books ought to be printed and those who believe they ought not to be there can be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of printing some copies for the use of the Commissioner, which are a part of the machinery of the office.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not now remember the exact number that I asked to insert at that time, but it was taken from the statistics which I had before me relating to former publications.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Nebraska may not be aware that we have now upon the table a resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing, without recommendation, to print a large number of the Agricultural Reports for 1874 and 1875, for popular distribution; and I am sure the Senator from Minnesota would prefer that the debate which must inevitably spring up upon that question should take place on the resolution itself, and not on this bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. If it is likely to give rise to any debate, I shall not ask that my proposition be incorporated here.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it had better be offered separately.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding to the clause in regard to the Agricultural Report:

To be distributed by him among the several States according to population.

Mr. ANTHONY. That entirely destroys the purpose of the original proposition. The Commissioner wants to distribute these reports among the persons who send him information. I do not suppose there would be fifty copies sent to the State that I partly represent, because it is not an agricultural State. The books, according to the original amendment, necessarily go to the agricultural States, in proportion to their agricultural products. He sends them out in return for information that he receives; he does not take much information from us, because it is of hardly any consequence what our agriculture may be. I hope the Senator will allow the amendment to stand as it is and not embarrass the Commissioner in the mode of distribution.

Mr. LOGAN. My object is to embarrass him so that he will distribute them fairly. I do not want them all distributed as they have been heretofore in one little place or two.

Mr. ANTHONY. What "little place or two?"

Mr. LOGAN. That is immaterial. I have my reasons for this. This is a proper amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have not been sent to Rhode Island.

Mr. LOGAN. They do not need them there; but I live in a country where we do need them; and I want him to distribute them among the people who need them. That is my object. I could illustrate, for instance, by the distribution of other books, if it was necessary to do so, where Congress appropriates money for the printing of so many books; so many are allowed to the House and so many to the Senate, and so many to the person who has charge of them, and a great many more of them go to Europe sometimes than to our own country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; they are intended to go there.

Mr. LOGAN. They are not intended to go there.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some are.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the object; but the class of legislation in reference to this particular is legislation for individual popularity. I am opposed to it. I want the books that we print to be distributed among our own people. With the exception of those which are necessary for agricultural societies in Europe, they all ought to be so distributed, unless the few given in exchange for other books; but our legislation has been to legislate for the individual himself to give him a reputation in other countries. I do not speak of this person, but of others. I desire the amendment to be adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest a modification of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. It will be hardly possible for the Commissioner to distribute these books among the States in proportion to population. Let it be "as nearly as may be."

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; add "as nearly as may be." I have no objection to that. I want them distributed in my country.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not dispute with the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer one more amendment. It is a bill that was introduced by me, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and reported from that committee by my colleague, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] who, I regret to say, is detained at home by illness. It met with the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Commerce, and it is for an object that is very much needed for the safety of commerce and navigation, quite as much so as any appropriation there is upon this bill. It is to come in on page 35, after line 548:

For the purpose of erecting a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock at the entrance of Narragansett Bay, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I offer from the Committee on Appropriations an amendment relating to the pay of one of the Senate employés that has been left out. After line 991 I move to insert:

To pay George N. Stranahan, conductor of the Senate elevator, $1,200 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following amendment; on page 30, after line 707, insert:

That section 3737 of the Revised Statutes be amended by inserting at the end of the first sentence of said section the words: "Excepting such cases in which the head of the proper Department shall consider it to be for the interest of the Government to permit such transfer to be made, and shall consent thereto in writing."

This amendment was to have been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in response to a recommendation of the Attorney-General of the United States, but the letter of the Attorney-General and the amendment have been unfortunately mislaid, and the honorable Senator from Minnesota, ascertaining that I had some knowledge of the amendment, desired that I should make the explanation necessary to the Senate.

Section 3737 of the Revised Statutes was the original act of 1862, intended to keep the control of contracts with the Government under the war powers of the Department in order that contractors should be subject to martial law, and forbade the transfer or assignment of their claims. I will read the section:

No contract or order, or any interest therein, shall be transferred by the party to whom such contract or order is given to any other party, and any such transfer shall cause the annulment of the contract or order transferred, so far as the United States are concerned. All rights of action, however, for any breach of such contract by the contracting parties, are reserved to the United States.

The attention of the Attorney-General was drawn to the fact that this forbade the assignment to responsible parties of a contract that was in hands not calculated to further the interests of the United States. He therefore made that recommendation to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and it was subcommitted to a gentleman who I understand has since gone to Saint Louis. I sent for a duplicate of that letter and submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and it seemed to meet his approbation. It was handed to my friend from Minnesota, but in some way was mislaid. Therefore I make this statement as having been personally cognizant of the recommendation of the Attorney-General.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the practical effect of the amendment?

Mr. BAYARD. It is to permit, at the discretion of the head of a Department, a contract to be assigned where he thinks the assignee is better able to carry it out than the original party.

Mr. CONKLING. What kind of a contract?

Mr. BAYARD. Any contract with the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I withdraw the notice I gave a while ago to reconsider the striking out of certain words on page 44.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider entered by the Senator from Arkansas is withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 1372:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be required to pay the expenses of a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to appraise certain Cherokee lands in the Indian Territory in accordance with the fifth section of the act making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian Department, approved May 29, 1872, $5,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw that amendment for a moment until I can move to reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware. I should like to have that considered a little further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to reconsider the vote just taken adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] As I heard only a part of what he stated, I should be glad to have him state again the ground on which that amendment is offered and exactly what it means. I should like to have the amendment read, and then I shall understand a little more about it than I do now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That section 3737 of the Revised Statutes be amended by inserting at the end of the first sentence of said section the words, "Excepting such cases in which the head of the proper Department shall consider it to be for the interests of the Government to permit such transfer to be made and shall consent thereto in writing."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I should like to have my friend explain it, if he will, again. I was not paying attention.

Mr. BAYARD. I regret that the communication of the Attorney-General recommending this amendment, which I may say was draughted by himself and sent to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, has been mislaid. I sent yesterday for a duplicate of the letter. I obtained it, and handed it to the Senator from Maine, but it has been mislaid by the Senator from Minnesota. I will state the object and effect of the amendment.

The section referred to originally was the act of July, 1862, passed during the existence of the war, and for the purpose of placing war contractors under military control, under martial law. The result has been that when they desired a year or two—which was the case I first heard of—in the building of the State Department that there should be an assignment of the contract into some responsible hands, on looking at the act the officers were of opinion that this prevented it and that the assignment could not take place, although it was manifestly for the interest of the Government; and it was stated in my presence by the Secretary of State to be for the interest of the Government that the contract should be assigned. And yet they said that under the language of this act it could not be. On the attention of the present Attorney-General, Mr. Taft, being called to it, he draughted the amendment which I have proposed. I believe I have followed his precise words, the object being that where a party from insolvency or from inability shall not be in a condition to fulfill his contract so well as the person to whom he proposes to assign it, it shall be lawful for the head of the Department to permit such transfer where he believes the Government will gain an advantage by it. There has been, I think, already some embarrassment in regard to the fulfillment of one of the chief contracts for the construction of this new building growing out of the embarrassments of the original contractor; and the object of this is to permit the assignment to be made to a responsible party, so that the Government may not be annoyed by a failure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a good deal of force in what the Senator from Delaware says as applied to the precise case that he describes of an executory contract in respect of which performance is due to the Government and where the contractor already provided for under the forms of law becomes unsuitable for any reason, and it is desirable, without the formality of a reletting, to transfer the performance of some duties to some one else. I can see the force of that in the case he has stated; but when you take it in all the Departments, the Post-Office notably, and perhaps the War and Navy Departments as well, where there are contracts for transportation and supplies, &c., whether it is wise, taking the world as it goes for one hundred years together, as this is permanent legislation, to authorize the head of any Department in his discretion (and we know how difficult it is to control discretion which is vested by law) to change from one contractor to another when it may be that the first one is responsible and the next one that the first contractor wishes to slip it off on to is not responsible at all, and does not care anything about it, is open in my mind to great question.

There are difficulties, I know. Cases occur when it would be highly to the interest of the Government to make such a transfer, undoubtedly, without the formality of fresh lettings and fresh bids; but I am afraid that it will happen more often that in just such cases mischief to the United States will be done than it will happen that good will be done. But that, Mr. President, applies, as the Senator has stated it, to executory contracts yet to be performed, in respect of which performance is due to the United States. Now, if my friend will look critically at this section he will see that it embraces something besides the sort of contracts we have been speaking of. "No contract, or order, or any interest therein." That, then, with this amendment agreed to on his motion, authorizes the head of any Department (and he, from the multifariousness of his duties, is obliged to depend upon some subordinate) to allow the assignment of an order; that is to say, some right or claim that some person has made, either rightfully or wrongfully, against the United States. If he makes that assignment and it happens to be discovered afterward that the United States had a good offset, which would be discovered in some other Bureau, the United States is cut out.

The policy of the law, going long back of 1862, which is the section now under consideration, and going way back into the fifties or forties or still earlier, has been—and it is found in another statute of the United States in this book—entirely against allowing any transfers or assignments of rights against the United States. They are to stand in the name of the original party, and after he gets his claim or demand allowed the warrant must be a warrant to pay him, or his legal representatives if he is dead; and then if he has any arrangement with anybody else it must come from him afterwards, after the Treasury has done with it. I think that proposition is based upon sound principles of public policy, for the security of a great many people who have transactions with the Government, even clerks against the machinations of sharpers to get assignments by way of orders for their pay in advance, and so on. I need not spend time by enumerating the cases. I think it is founded in the soundest principles of public policy and of proper protection to all persons. Now the amendment covers all that. I submit, therefore, inasmuch as this is an appropriation bill, that this matter of legislation about contracts and orders between citizens and the Government had better be left to separate legislation.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe that this amendment was very clearly and sensibly in the line of public interest. I have been told by two members of the Cabinet that they were embarrassed by the act of 1862 which now has the force of a general law and which by examination will be found to be an act relating to contracts for Army supplies. It was under an act to obtain Army supplies that this language found itself upon our statute-book. To compel the Government to continue a contract with a party disabled from any cause—a frequent cause at the present day is insolvency—from completing the contract made with him is embarrassing to the Government and helpful to no man. It frequently occurs that the sureties, responsible parties, are those who desire to take the contract in their hands and fulfill it to the letter. Such cases arise to my mind and which, I believe, were the cause of bringing this very question before the present Secretary of State and the War Department. If there be anything loose in this language, "Contract, or order, or interest," it may be modified to the degree of allowing contracts strictly made to be assigned. I do not know what precisely "order or interest therein" may mean, except it have reference to a class of supplies only catalogued in a war bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator will see as the section now stands in the Revised Statutes it is universal; it does not relate to any one Department or to supplies, whatever may have been its origin.

Mr. BAYARD. I knew that this amendment had met the favor and was drawn by the hand of an officer who had held two of these Cabinet offices, that of Attorney-General last and that of Secretary of War prior to that time, and that he knew the practical necessity of the amendment. I was requested to bring his letter to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and did it. I would not have said a word about it now but for the fact that they lost the paper which came from the office; and as the Senator from Maine is not here, and the Senator from Minnesota had not had the matter explained, he asked me to do it, and so I have tried to do it. It is a matter, I think, of public interest that this amendment should be made. As a transfer is only to be made in such cases as the head of the proper Department shall consider it for the benefit of the Government that it should be made, I cannot see why the same power that made the original contract should not be permitted to assign that contract to equally responsible hands. If they were fit to be trusted in making the contract, then they are fit to be trusted to assign it; but I say, if they cannot be trusted to assign it, they should not have been intrusted with power to approve it originally. It simply leaves the contract open, so that, where it is for the interest of the Government that an assignment should be permitted, it may be done; not the interest of the party, not the interest of the contractor, but where it is for the interest of the Government that this assignment should be permitted then by giving his written consent the head of the Department may allow the assignment to be made.

I can well understand, and I have heard of cases in which the Government has been embarrassed with a failing, insolvent contractor, constantly liable to attachment, to annoyance from his creditors, where he was endeavoring in a crippled condition to perform his contract, and where responsible parties, liable for him, were willing to go forward and carry it on and complete the work for the benefit of the Government, and yet the head of the Department has been prevented from permitting an assignment by this statute, which it is clear to my mind, which it must be clear to the minds of Senators who read it, was not made to affect cases like this. The act of 1862 was an act passed in war times; it was meant to submit contractors to the strong hand of martial law and military power; the Articles of War were meant to control them and hold them personally to the proper performance of their duty, and yet by the method in which this codification of our laws has been carried out this provision, intended to be restricted to the single case of Army supplies, now applies to the whole class of governmental contracts of every description. I submit to the Senate that if it is right that these officials should ever have power to enter into a contract, that same confidence that has delegated that power to them should certainly permit them to allow the contract to be assigned.

I have said all I care to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not want to waste the time of the Senate; but this matter, in my opinion, is of considerable consequence. The committee to which I belong has had frequent occasion, in the multifarious matters of legal disputes between the United States and various persons, to consider the subject of the law about the assignment of claims and of contracts. I think I can safely say for us all that the average of our observation and experience is largely in favor of leaving the law as it is. There is one case to which this amendment of the Senator would apply acoording to my information; of course it may turn out to be otherwise; I do not mean to criticise anybody in this debate or to refer to any special instance by name; but there is a case which has occurred in the Treasury Department within the last eight or ten years—I have forgotten the exact date—where by an assignment being recognized of a matter of business between the United States and certain persons, if they succeed in their claim, (and unless these statutes will cut it off, as I think it will turn out they do, they will succeed,) a perfectly good set-off that the United States had against the original party is entirely gone. The assignment having been recognized, the money we should have had has gone from us, and we have no means of getting it back, if the assignment is good. The assignees will have got their money and the claim of the United States against the original party who assigned his rights under the contract will be lost. Those cases occur all the time.

If you turn to section 3477 you will see that the statutes, going back to the year 1853 at least, provide in the most explicit terms against assignments of any claims upon the United States or any part or share thereof, and make them absolutely null and void unless the thing is made after the allowance and all rights between the United States and the parties are settled. If the amendment stands as proposed, its general effect will be of course to repeal this provision of section 3737 to that extent so as to make it lawful to assign every contract, every order, and all interests in contracts and orders, of people having business affairs or claims upon the United States. That, as I have said already, would be most detrimental to the public interest, and indeed to the security of many private citizens, clerks, and that class of men who are in the service of the Government. It does seem to me, therefore, that if the whole thing has any effect in respect of mere executory contracts, which in my mind is open to great doubt, we ought to leave it to separate legislation rather than to put it into an appropriation bill, which both the Senator from Delaware and myself on former occasions have resisted, as he knows I have done before.

I hope the Senator will consent that this vote be reconsidered and left for consideration by the proper committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Whether the Senate shall agree to this amendment or not is a matter to me of purely public interest entirely. I stated that this section, 3737, never had existed as the law of this country, to my knowledge, until the 17th of July, 1862, and it then was enacted solely as a war measure. At page 594, twelfth volume of the Statutes at Large, is found an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes." Section 13 of that act provides:

That all contracts made for, or orders given for the purchase of, goods or supplies by any Department of the Government shall be promptly reported to Congress by the proper head of such Department if Congress shall at the time be in session, and if not in session, said reports shall be made at the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Section 14 of the same act provides:

That no contract or order, or any interest therein, shall be transferred by the party or parties to whom such contract or order may be given to any other party or parties, and that any such transfer shall cause the annulment of the contract or order transferred, so far as the United States are concerned: Provided, That all rights of action are hereby reserved to the United States for any breach of such contract by the contracting party or parties.

These are the words themselves, ipissima verba, section 14 of this law, with section 3737 of the Revised Statutes. What has been the result of it? That you have carried into the general law of the country an act of Congress relating and intended only to relate to the furnishing of war supplies and for the purpose of bringing contractors for war supplies in time of war under the strong and the prompt arm of military law. That was the effect of it, and that was all. That the effect of this law has been enlarged beyond anything contemplated by the Congress that passed it, by importing it into the Revised Statutes and giving it a sectional head here (3737) no one, I think, can doubt. It would be to me a question of great doubt whether the law as it stood would be applicable to any except supply contracts at all or contracts for other things than mere supplies of war; but nevertheless the law as it stands and as it has been revised and codified does seem to have the effect to forbid action by the heads of Departments even when they think it is strongly to the interest of the Government to permit a contract to be assigned from a weak hand to a stronger one, from one incapable of carrying out the object of the contract to one capable of carrying it out.

I believe it is for the interest of public service that this amendment shall be made. The Senate can pass upon it at their pleasure. If I had not thought it was proper I should not have recommended it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish to speak to the merits of this case, but I suggest to the Senator who moves the amendment that instead of amending the section of the Revised Statutes he should repeal the existing section and re-enact a new one. That has been done in several cases, and that ought to be done in every such case. We ought not to amend a section by inserting something or taking something out of it, and leaving no other clew to its meaning. The old section should be repealed and a new one enacted.

Mr. BAYARD. It seems to me perfectly clear that where the officer whom you have intrusted to make the original contract, in whose hands you have deposited that high and plenary discretion, shall desire to exercise it a second time in favor of the Government, the very reason why you have intrusted him in the first instance should a fortiori induce you to intrust him in the latter case. You simply give him the power of confirmation, the power of confirmation enlightened by experience. He has made a contract with a party whom he believed at the time capable of carrying it out. Subsequent events disclose the fact that the party is incapable of carrying it out, and then you retain on your statute-books, or refuse to amend by what I must conceive to be a reasonable amendment, a provision which maintains the lack of power in him to serve the Government by permitting a transfer.

Mr. WRIGHT. I concur in what the Senator from Rhode Island has said with reference to an amendment of the statutes. I listened to the amendment as offered by the Senator from Delaware and was utterly unable to tell its connection or its meaning, and so it will be with any person, it seems to me, who takes up this appropriation bill, if it is to become a law, and reads what he proposes to add to the present bill. He will read that such a section shall be amended by adding thereto so and so, and it will be utterly impossible for any person to tell what that means, unless he gets the section itself and together reads them. We started a practice, and a practice that I trust will not be abandoned, that when we propose to amend the Revised Statutes we shall do so by re-enacting the section with the words we propose to add, or the changed words, so that when we come to read the statute as thus amended we can see at once what the law now is.

I therefore trust that this proposition to reconsider will carry, if for no other reason, that the Senator may put his amendment in form to accord with what has been the practice of the Senate heretofore. For myself, I shall never consent to the amendment of any section of the Revised Statutes except by a re-enactment of the section itself. By the constitutions of many States in the Union, it is now provided expressly that no amendments shall be made except by the re-enacting of the section. That rule ought to be adopted and adhered to here. I think that not a little of the trouble that occurs in the construction of statutes arises from the fact that we tack on an amendment, as is proposed in this instance, to an appropriation bill or something else, and we amend a section of a statute by adding to it or striking out and inserting, and then it requires a dozen lawyers almost to get the statutes together and see what they mean.

I trust that this motion to reconsider will be carried, if for no other reason, and without any expression of opinion now as to the merits of the question. There is also, in my mind, I may suggest, a very great impropriety in this amendment, owing to the fact that it is independent legislation, in no manner, that I can see, connected with this appropriation bill.

Mr. WINDOM. When the Senator from Delaware offered this amendment, I made no objection to it, because it was my impression, and still is, that it had the indorsement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I had not examined the question at all, and was not even able, during the pressure of considering the bill, with so many amendments pending, to refer to the statute; but, for the reason so well stated by the Senator from Iowa, I think it should be reconsidered. If there is any great public necessity for this general legislation, it should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary or some other appropriate committee. I think the Senate can hardly be consistent with itself in adopting this amendment. It certainly gives rise to a great deal of debate. There is a great deal of doubt about it. It is not a question of appropriation, but purely and simply a question of legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances, as the amendment is likely to give rise to further debate and is legislative in its character, I move that the amendment lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. What has become of the amendment which I offered some time ago, when I yielded temporarily?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after line 1372:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be required, to pay the expenses of a commissioner to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to appraise certain Cherokee lands in the Indian Territory, in accordance with the fifth section of the act making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian Department approved May 29, 1872, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is merely to comply with the treaty stipulations which we made with these Cherokees in 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear that treaty stipulation.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Vermont will turn to the seventeenth volume of the statute, page 190, he will find it provided:

That the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior are hereby authorized to make an appraisement of the Cherokee lands lying west of the ninety-sixth meridian of west longitude, and west of the land of the Osage Indians, in the Indian Territory, and south of the southern line of the State of Kansas, &c.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior and a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the letter of the Secretary read.

Mr. ALLISON. I will send it to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 21, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a copy of a letter dated the 19th instant, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, upon the subject of the appraisement of certain Cherokee lands lying west of the ninety-sixth meridian of west longitude in the Indian Territory, under authority conferred in section 5 of the act making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, approved May 29, 1872. (Statutes, volume 17, page 190.)

An estimate of appropriation for the purpose contemplated, to the amount of $5,000, accompanies the communication of the Commissioner.

The subject is respectfully presented to Congress for the favorable consideration of that body.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. CHANDLER,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. It is provided for in the treaty of 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was trying to find it in the treaty of 1866.

Mr. ALLISON. The object is to make a survey with a view of settling some friendly tribes in the Indian Territory. I have also here the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommending it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator refer to the article of the treaty under which this arises?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the article of the treaty before me. It is the treaty of July, 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the treaty here, but the treaty is very long.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot direct the Senator to the particular article.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These articles are too long to read until I reach the point that is material.

Mr. ALLISON. This is intended to apply to lands already ceded by the Cherokee Indians to the United States under article 15 of the treaty of July, 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a cession in trust or an absolute cession? Are these trust lands?

Mr. ALLISON. It is an absolute cession to the United States of a portion of their reservation west of the ninety-sixth meridian, and not east of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is article 16:

The United States may settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of ninety-six degrees, to be taken in a compact form in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres for each member of each of said tribes thus to be settled; the boundaries of each of said districts to be distinctly marked, and the land conveyed in fee-simple to each of said tribes, to be held in common or by their members in severalty as the United States may decide.

Said lands thus disposed of to be paid for to the Cherokee Nation, at such price as may be agreed on between the said parties in interest, subject to the approval of the President; and if they should not agree, then the price to be fixed by the President.

The Cherokee Nation to retain the right of possession of and jurisdiction over all of said country west of ninety-six degrees of longitude until thus sold and occupied, after which their jurisdiction and right of possession to terminate forever as to each of said districts thus sold and occupied.

The object of this amendment is to provide for taking those lands and appraising them?

Mr. ALLISON. For appraising them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And paying for them?

Mr. DORSEY. They are already paid for.

Mr. ALLISON. They have been already ceded by the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Article 16 cedes the lands to the United States as they may be wanted for the settlement of these friendly Indians in the way named. Then it says the lands thus disposed of are to be "paid for to the Cherokee Nation at such price as may be agreed on between the said parties in interest, subject to the approval of the President." This, therefore, is to provide the first step for buying these lands west of ninety-six degrees to settle different Indians upon?

Mr. ALLISON. That is all there is of it.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not know what that applies to, but I know the fact nevertheless that the Government has taken possession of these lands under the act of 1872 to locate the Osage and Cheyenne Indians upon them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was done under the act of 1872, probably, which authorizes the President to make an appraisement of these lands.

Mr. ALLISON. It is all in the act of 1872.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the act of 1872 has been executed, what is the use of appraising them over again?

Mr. ALLISON. It has not been carried out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Arkansas says it has been.

Mr. ALLISON. It has been as to the Osages, but not as to these lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert after line 1355—

For payment of employés at Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, Nebraska, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, $11,880.

I think Senators will not vote against this amendment if they understand it. The appropriation at these agencies failed about the 1st of February, and Congress at that time passed an appropriation for subsistence for the residue of this fiscal year. That appropriation was passed in some considerable haste, because of the fact that these Indians were without subsistence. There was an omission to provide for the employés. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has stated to me that it was understood that this appropriation should go in this bill originally. It has not appeared in the House bill, and he urges very strongly that it shall appear here, because upon the faith of the promise that we should pay these official employés in the service the work has already been done, and they ought to be paid for their services.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Minnesota will excuse me a moment longer, I move to amend the appropriation in line 720 by inserting "twenty-five," so as to increase the appropriation for expenses of buoyage from $300,000 to $325,000. This sum has been appropriated for the light-house service for several years. It is a very important service, in fact a necessary service. I am told by the secretary of the Light-House Board that it will require $20,000 more this year than last.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. On the 19th day of February, 1875, an act was passed "to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations and to confirm existing leases." Under that act three commissioners were appointed, whose duty was declared to be, by the fifth section of that act, to cause all lands within the villages on said reservations to be surveyed, the lots to be laid and defined, and the boundaries of the villages to be designated.

Mr. WINDOM. It is quite impossible to hear a word the Senator has said.

Mr. INGALLS. I was referring to the act of February 19, 1875, authorizing the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany Indian reservations, and alluding to the provisions of that law requiring a commission to be appointed, designating the boundaries of those reservations, and to lay out and define the villages that had been erected upon them, and to also plot the village lots. I was going on to say that the commissioners had been appointed, the work had been partially done, and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office have estimated for the amount necessary to carry on the service; but, owing to a misunderstanding, the estimates were sent to the House at too late a period to enable them to be put upon this bill. On the 27th of June the Committee on Public Lands in the House, to whom was referred the communication from the Interior Department relating to the survey of the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, reported the same back to the House and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with a recommendation that the sum of $15,500 be appropriated to pay for the service, as estimated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. At that time this bill had already passed out of the hands of the Committee on Appropriations of the House and been transmitted to the Senate. I am authorized by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, in view of the recommendation made and the estimate forwarded by the Secretary of the Interior, to offer the following amendment to the pending bill, to come in after line 1372:

To carry out the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875, to pay for surveys as estimated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $15,500.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations have not been able to investigate this question in order to either approve or disapprove. I have no knowledge of the facts of the case. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas, however, if it is quite clear that the Government should pay the expenses of this service, or should not the Indians pay a portion or the whole of it?

Mr. INGALLS. The act of Congress that was passed on the 19th day of February, 1875, created this commisson and directed them to designate and define the boundaries of these reservations, to lay out the villages, and to survey the lots. It was a direct specific authority on the part of Congress requiring the Secretary of the Interior to appoint these commissioners. He simply performed ministerially the duty devolved upon him by Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. There was no appropriation made for the payment of expenses, I believe?

Mr. INGALLS. After the act was passed, in the apropriation bill that immediately succeeded, a simple appropriation was made for the purpose of carrying out the preliminary work necessary to be done; but the subsequent appropriation has not been made.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask the Senator if he knows whether there was any understanding that the expenses were to be paid by the Indians or by the occupants at the time? I do not know of any such understanding myself.

Mr. INGALLS. There was such an understanding. If the Senator will be at the trouble to read the statute to which I have referred, he will see that the direction is explicit and final, and that the Secretary of the Interior merely has effectuated an act of Congress in appointing those commissioners and the work has partially been done.

Mr. WINDOM. I am not prepared to resist it. I only have the judgment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which is much better than mine, although it seems to me a question which deserves consideration.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. At some time, and now if it does not interfere with the arrangement of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the amendment adopted on the second page of the bill in reference to the pay to the estate of Henry Wilson, late Vice-President, of a certain sum. It was originally to pay to his executors "to be held and applied by said executors as if a part of the estate of said Wilson, given and bequeathed by his will." The Senate adopted an amendment—I was absent at the time—directing, instead of such disposition here, that it be paid to his heirs.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee have reconsidered their action, and I make no objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to know what is the object of a reconsideration.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it to allow the clause to stand as it came from the House?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir. The purpose of my motion is to reconsider in order to give the committee an opportunity to state some reason why they made the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I understood on conference with several members of the Committee on Appropriations that they have reconsidered their action. I have reconsidered my own, I will say.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that those who originated this paragraph in the bill as it passed the House are very strong in their opposition to this change of the disposition of the money. It is rather a delicate matter, if the donation can be made to his estate, to change it from the mode in which he himself desired it to be disposed of. He prescribed by will what he desired to be done with the little estate which he did have. His estate was so small and his circumstances were such that his friends induced the House of Representatives to insert the paragraph making this allowance and providing that it be disposed of according to his will. He had dependent on him a little adopted daughter and a wife's mother nearly ninety years old in very feeble health. Of course the old lady will continue but a little while; but this is a charge upon the little estate which he has, and that estate I understand from his executors to be much smaller than was supposed.

Mr. SARGENT. About what amount?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to say. I think his Representative in the House told me that his whole estate, everything all told, was less than this provision.

Mr. SARGENT. The views of the Senator from Massachusetts would have great weight with me and I know they would with the committee. We were in some doubt in reference to the matter and desired to retain jurisdiction of the question for the committee of conference by this amendment. We understood that there was an adopted daughter who would be left unprovided for except by the amount left of the estate, and that there was an aged wife's mother. We thought it quite possible, however, as Mr. Wilson had some brothers, some of whom were quite old and in want, that if he had an estate twice the size he did have at the time of his death he would have made some provision for them. I understood further that by the provisions of the will the portion of the estate which goes to the aged mother-in-law inures on her death to the benefit of some persons who are quite wealthy, as we have understood, worth $60,000 or $70,000; and perhaps the United States would not be willing to make this donation to go in that direction. We put in the word "heirs," which would send it to the blood relatives of Mr. Wilson, who were overlooked in his will under the possible hypothesis that he himself would have made such a disposition of it if he had had it to dispose of at that time. I would like here to say in reference to Mr. Wilson, for a long time illustrious in the history of this country, doing good service in its legislative halls, that it is a matter of pride, I think, to those who served with him in Congress that at his death, after this long service, he died poor as he did. He certainly never enriched himself at the public expense, and he gave his whole time to his country, and by that means died poor, unless he saw fit to enrich himself by the opportunities that sometimes fall in the way of dishonest public men, thus showing that he was honest in every fiber of his being. I therefore look with great favor on this appropriation for the benefit of the estate of Mr. Wilson, and was only anxious that it should go in some channel that would do the most good. If the Senator from Massachusetts thinks we had better reconsider and allow it to follow the course of the will, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DAWES. I have only to say that I have no personal knowledge either in reference to the estate of Mr. Wilson or his relations to the beneficiaries under the will. I speak now as I am requested to do by his own Representative in the other branch. I understood him to say that he had satisfied the Committee on Appropriations that it would be better to let the item stand as it came from the House. I know he is very anxious on the subject. It is rather a delicate matter as between his heirs, who are poor brothers, one a cripple; and there are other circumstances in connection with those brothers that make it a questionable matter what would be our duty in the premises. I feel as if I should not desire myself to take the responsibility. In general terms, if he has disposed of his property as he thought under all the circumstances was the wisest, it would seem to be better to let it take the course prescribed by his will. That is all I desire to say.

I know I have been approached in the same manner that the Committee on Appropriations have been to effect this change, and I have been unable myself to see that it is right. Yet, I do not want to be the instrument of depriving those heirs of any money which they should have. Mr. WARREN, a highly respectable gentleman who represents him in the other House, introduced this measure with great generosity and liberality of feeling, having been opposed to him always in politics, and he took a great personal interest in it. He desired very much that this should be so. I suppose, therefore, that he represents the interests at Mr. Wilson's home. If it be true, as the Senator from California has said, of which I have no other knowledge, that one-half of the estate, after the death of the aged mother-in-law, is to go to the rich relatives, I should be almost tempted to withdraw any remark I might have made.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe they are not even relatives.

Mr. DAWES. If it is to go where it is not needed, I should be almost tempted to withdraw my remarks. I do not know about that fact. I know there is some doubt how much good it will do if the amendment of the Senate committee should continue in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. As the Senator is in some doubt, had it not better go to the committee of conference and let the matter be further considered?

Mr. DAWES. I think on the whole it would be better to leave it there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion to reconsider?

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I have one or two amendments which I was not able to put my hand upon when on the floor before. On page 21, in line 492, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty." This increases by $5,000 the amount appropriated for "defending suits against the Secretary of the Treasury or his agents for the seizure of captured or abandoned property, and for the examination of witnesses," &c. I hold in my hand a very long letter from the Attorney-General urging strongly that this amount be increased, that $25,000 is not sufficient, and that the protection of the Government requires a larger amount, namely, $30,000. I move the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 2, after line 35, I move to insert:

For furniture and repairs of furniture for the Senate of the United States fiscal year 1876, $600.

The committee are informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that there is a deficiency for that amount, and that a large portion of this expenditure was for the purchase of tables and making preparations for the trial of the impeachment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. On page 18 I move to strike out the proviso relating to marshals, beginning in line 428.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

Provided, That the maximum compensation allowed to marshals and regulated by section 841 of the Revised Statutes, from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, shall not exceed $5,000 a year, or that rate for any time less than a year; and marshals are forbid issuing any certificates or due-bills to witnesses, jurors, guards, deputies, or others for fees or services, and the payment of any such certificates or due-bills is forbidden by any Department of the Government; and no advance of money shall be made to any marshal whose accounts have not been adjusted at the Treasury for a period of more than six months; and hereafter no charge for mileage shall be allowed to any marshal, and in lieu of mileage marshals shall only be paid for their actual traveling expenses incurred in the performance of their official duties, to be rendered upon oath.

Mr. SARGENT. Some of the provisions there unquestionably will have to be retained in conference. Some are useful; for instance, the one in reference to certifying accounts toward the last part of the amendment. But if you take the first part of the amendment, it would be impracticable. Out of the amount of compensation, $5,000, the marshals have to pay their deputies. It is very apparent in a place where there is a great deal of business that the marshal would be compelled not only to do all his work himself, or pay for deputies out of his own pocket, and the amount would be soon exhausted.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator is entirely in error. The deputies get pay by mileage and per diem. They do not get pay out of the salary.

Mr. ALLISON. This repeals all mileage, and only allows them actual expenses under oath, and no per diem.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Arkansas will examine it, he will find that it is inconsistent. Unquestionably some of this legislation can be retained with advantage, but the manner in which it is in the bill will require a great deal of shaping so as not to absolutely destroy the office of marshal.

Mr. DORSEY. I withdraw my opposition. Let it go.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I am compelled to believe that the Senate improvidently agreed to the amendment of the committee striking out the clause on page 3, between lines 55 and 60, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge. This clause provides for the payment by the House of Representatives of the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the rate of $1,800 per annum. There appear to me to be two reasons why the amendment of the committee should not be agreed to. In the first place, I do not think the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate are proper judges of what is required in the way of clerical force by the House of Representatives. For that reason alone, inasmuch as upon the preceding page the committee have reported an amendment to the bill for clerical services to a Senate committee, I believe that the amendment should not be agreed to.

In the second place, from my knowledge of the services performed by the clerk of that committee, of the great number of cases that are before it constantly for action, I am confident that it is absolutely necessary that the amendment should not be adopted and that the clerk should be allowed an annual compensation. There are something like eleven hundred cases upon the docket of that committee in the House. There are nearly six hundred before the Committee on Pensions in the Senate. The Senator will therefore see that it is absolutely essential for the efficient discharge of the duties of that committee that there should be some extraclerical compensation allowed. I hope that by common consent the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the clause allowed to stand as it came in the bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that I have any special objection to the reconsideration; but I want to say with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that the committee seem to have been intermeddling with House affairs——

Mr. INGALLS. No, I did not make that suggestion.

Mr. WINDOM. As the committee read this proposition it was to give back pay to the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the House, and knowing the opposition of that House as well as this to back pay, the committee thought it would be doing them a favor as well as ourselves to strike it out, at least for consideration. Undoubtedly the clerk of that committee knew when he took his appointment something of the character of the work to be done, and I presume he receives the same pay that former clerks of that committee received; but this bill proposes to go back to the time of his appointment and pay him at the rate of $1,800 per annum. The people of this country have expressed themselves very emphatically upon the subject of back pay; and acting upon that, the committee struck it out.

Mr. INGALLS. The clause expressly provides that any amount he shall have received shall be deducted from this compensation.

Mr. WINDOM. That is very true; but this is an increase, and he takes back pay for the increased sum.

Mr. INGALLS. It is precisely the same amount that has been paid the clerk of that committee in previous Congresses. The Senator states that he knew what amount of business he would have to perform. I would say that the number of cases has been very considerably increased; I think it is more than threefold what it ever has been before any committee of the body previously.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator, if he received the same compensation before, why is it necessary to pass this act? He must have received $1,800 from the time of his appointment then.

Mr. INGALLS. Because the provision previously has been for pay merely during the sessions of Congress; but the amount of business now before the committee is such that it is absolutely indispensable that the clerk should have compensation to enable him to stay after the expiration of Congress, in order to restore the papers to the Pension Office, if nothing else.

Mr. WINDOM. If it is so, it is not back pay, as the committee understood it to be, because he commenced his services last December; did he not?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. That would not be back pay.

Mr. INGALLS. He took his place on the committee at the commencement of this session of Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. I make no objection to the amount, with that explanation.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate be reconsidered and that the item stand as it came from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. By unanimous consent the vote is reconsidered and the item restored.

Mr. HARVEY. I move to amend the bill by inserting after line 1264:

For workshop for military convicts at the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, $60,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator for an explanation of that and a statement of the authority upon which he offers the amendment.

Mr. HARVEY. At Fort Leavenworth is located, I believe, the only military prison in the United States for the detention of military convicts. It has been but lately located there, and there are no shops there in which the men can be employed as the convicts are in other penitentiaries. It is better for the physical and moral health of the men that they should be employed. That is recognized as a fact in all penitentiaries of every kind, I believe, throughout the world.

As to the authority with which the proposition comes, I am credibly informed that the commander of the department in which this prison is located had estimates made, with plans and specifications, and that such papers were forwarded to the War Department. The member of the House from the district in which the prison is located, I understand, applied to the Department for information on this subject, and has not yet received it, owing to the changes that have been made in the Department in the last few months.

Mr. WINDOM. I regret exceedingly to raise the point of order; but it seems to me that in the estimation of the Department this matter could not have been as pressing as it is in the estimation of my friend. We should have some letter, some indication from the Department direct that it is necessary. We have no estimate, no communication from the Department on the subject. I therefore must raise the point of order.

Mr. HARVEY. I was just going to state that within the last few months, as all Senators know, the head of the War Department has been changed two or three times, and in the confusion thus arising the evident necessity of this improvement may have been overlooked.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the head of that Department has been examining this bill quite carefully, because only this morning he requested us to reduce from $40,000 to $16,000 one item on this very subject of prisons. So I think he has not overlooked it.

Mr. HARVEY. My understanding is that the reduction to which the Senator refers was upon an item of appropriation to maintain convicts that were incarcerated elsewhere, in State penitentiaries, and properly made because the necessary cost of maintaining them could be greatly reduced by forwarding them to this prison constructed for the purpose. I think that is the very reason why that estimate could be so reduced.

Mr. WINDOM. Although this discussion is out of order, I hardly think the Secretary of War anticipated that we would build this prison without any recommendation. So he could hardly have made this request expecting that we would volunteer to build a prison.

Mr. HARVEY. The prison is already built; and it is in such a condition that prisoners can be incarcerated there; and this proposition is to build workshops wherein they may be employed. Every one knows that prisoners of any kind are much better when employed, the discipline is better, the health is better, the morals are better; it is better for the community that every one should have employment even though he be restrained of his liberty for a time. It is with this view I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the question of order is raised on the ground that this amendment is not recommended by the head of any Department or by any standing committee of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. If those facts be so, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARVEY. Does the Chair rule that it is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. HARVEY. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CONOVER. I have an amendment to offer. On page 37, after line 893, I move to insert:

For the protection of the naval timber lands, $5,000.

I will state that that has been the usual appropriation for years. By inadvertence, I suppose, it was left out of the naval appropriation bill this year. It is very necessary that an appropriation of that kind should be made for the live-oak and pine lands, where the timber is subject to thieves, depredators, and it is taken away.

Mr. WINDOM. Is it recommended by a committee or by the Department?

Mr. CONOVER. I think not; but I think the committee ought not to object to it inasmuch as it has been done for years. It is a customary appropriation. It is in several of the naval appropriation bills that I have looked at.

Mr. WINDOM. Evidently in the opinion of the Department it is not as necessary as it has formerly been; and, as they have not estimated for it, I am compelled to raise the point of order.

Mr. CONOVER. I think they did estimate for it; but for some reason, either because of the absence of the Senators from Florida or something else, it was left out of the naval bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to sustain the point of order. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee on page 8, line 167, was agreed to, and I desire to state just at this moment that I shall, if that motion succeeds, offer an amendment to reduce the appropriation for the Interior Department, on line 170, and also for the Post-Office Department, on line 174. The reason is this: There is a great discrepancy between the House and the Senate on the appropriations for printing for these Departments. I have taken the reports of the Congressional Printer for 1873, 1874, and 1875 and examined them carefully and made a table. It seems to me that $50,000 can be taken off these appropriations without doing any harm to any one. They are largely in excess of the expenditure of the past, and I think we can get nearer to the House if we keep closer to the expenditures of the past.

In 1873 the Interior Department spent for printing $70,328.76; in 1874, $191,134.45; in 1875, $209,737.56; and yet there is an appropriation in this bill of $225,000, $15,000 more than was expended last year, instead of a reduction. So of the Post-Office Department. Its printing bill was $87,332.88 in 1873; $160,756.44 in 1874; $157,689.94 in 1875; and the Senate increases it to $175,000 in this bill. So of the War Department. Its printing in 1873 cost $43,508.79; in 1874, $94,616.13; and in 1875, $99,998.28; and the Senate committee increases it to $120,000 in this bill.

I propose, if we reconsider these three propositions, to offer amendments reducing them to the actual expenditures. The table before me exhibits the figures as to all the Departments:

Amounts expended for printing for the various Departments for the years ending September 30, 1873, 1874, and 1875.

† Amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote on separate amendments in this paragraph? The Senate adopted the amendments as a whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment referred to was adopted. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. WINDOM. Can a motion be made to reconsider a portion without reconsidering the whole of the amendments?

Mr. SARGENT. I trust my colleague on the committee will not insist on that point. That would prevent us hereafter from taking a vote in gross. I think it would be a very bad precedent to set. It is very convenient to concur in the whole; but if a Senator afterward found that by that he forfeited his right to act upon a separate amendment, it would discourage the practice. I hope the point of order, even if it be good, will not be insisted upon.

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose we are not bound by precedents in this matter, but by the rule; and the rule is to reserve such amendments as are desired for separate action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate. Whether any particular amendments were reserved, he is not aware.

Mr. WHYTE. According to the record, if I remember correctly, the Senator from Minnesota himself reserved the right to make an amendment after the adoption of these amendments in gross.

Mr. WINDOM. Not to make amendments upon the amendments already agreed to, but to offer additional amendments to the text.

Mr. WHYTE. There was a reservation, then, at that time. If I am not mistaken some amendments have been already reconsidered this morning.

Mr. WINDOM. By unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Maryland to make a motion to reconsider any particular amendment; but he proposes to reconsider three amendments.

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; I propose to reconsider these amendments——

Mr. SARGENT. Take one at a time.

Mr. WHYTE. If there is no objection, I will make the motion in that form.

Mr. DORSEY. I object to reconsidering any amendment that has been adopted by the Senate. My understanding is that the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the amendments which were not excepted to, not reserved, were adopted by the Senate and cannot now be called up again.

Mr. WINDOM. I raise the point of order on this question for another reason. I am told we are threatened with a four-hours' speech from some quarter if this vote is reconsidered, and I am sure the Senate do not want that.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like the Senator from Minnesota to inform us from what quarter he expects it. I do not think anybody has four hours' speaking in him this day; certainly it is not I.

Mr. WINDOM. It is a vague apprehension of mine, increased by some indications I have seen and statements I have heard.

Mr. WHYTE. I thought we were limited to five minutes. I thought that rule had been adopted.

Mr. WINDOM. It is very easy to avoid that rule, of course.

Mr. WHYTE. As far as I am concerned, I give my friend from Minnesota fair notice that if this vote is reconsidered he will not get a five-minute speech out of me. I only want to make a movement in the interest of economy, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are actually appropriating more money for next year for the printing of these three Departments than they spent last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Maryland designate the amendment he wishes reconsidered.

Mr. WHYTE. I will try the question on the first. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment appropriating $120,000 for the printing and binding for the War Department, in line 167, page 8, was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Without saying anything about the merits of the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, I venture to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we embark on that practice now there will be no end to an appropriation bill; and I ask the ruling of the Chair on the point whether an amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole and concurred in in the Senate can afterward be reconsidered in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that, these amendments having been concurred in in the Senate, a motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. WEST. Let me ask the Chair whether these amendments have been agreed to in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both, as the Chair understands. They were first agreed to in committee and then concurred in by the Senate in gross. The Chair does not profess to be much of a parliamentarian, and has followed the advice of one better informed than himself in such matters. The question is on the motion to reconsider, as made by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to know the ruling of the Chair on the point of order. I have not understood the ruling yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me that the Senate as in Committee of the Whole passed certain amendments; the bill was then reported to the Senate; the Chair then put the question, Shall the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole be concurred in by the Senate? Several amendments were excepted and all the other amendments were concurred in by one vote. Undoubtedly it is in the power of the Senator from Maryland to move to reconsider the vote by which all the unexcepted amendments were concurred in, but he cannot move to select one amendment and move to reconsider that because there was no vote taken adopting such amendment. You can only reconsider a vote which has been taken, and the vote which was taken was to concur in all the amendments with certain exceptions, and these amendments referred to by the Senator from Maryland were not excepted. It seems to me that the proper mode of proceeding is to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, and that opens the whole bill, and then it is in the power of any Senator to move to reject any amendment that was adopted in committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is undoubtedly correct. The Chair supposed there was a separate vote upon this identical amendment that the Senator from Maryland now moves to reconsider.

Mr. ANTHONY. My recollection is that there was not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the vote was on the amendments in the aggregate, the Chair would rule that a motion to reconsider any one of the particular amendments concurred in in gross would not be in order.

Mr. WHYTE. As this is a precedent, I think we had better understand it as we go along. As I understand, for the purpose of saving the time of the Senate we permit amendments to be adopted in gross, and especially reserve certain amendments out merely for the convenience of the Senate. I do not understand that there is any rule of the Senate which precludes a Senator from afterward moving to reconsider a particular amendment that may have been adopted in gross. Hereafter, however, when Senators ask us to allow them to be adopted in gross, we shall know that they mean to cut themselves off from every motion to reconsider that is not permitted unanimously by the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHYTE. never understood that rule to prevail in the Senate before.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has prevailed for seventeen years to my certain knowledge. How can you reconsider a vote that you have not passed? After the bill had been reported to the Senate, the Senate never adopted the motion which the Senator from Maryland desires to reconsider. It adopted a general motion covering a large number of amendments, and the Chair gave notice—I presume the Chair did—that any Senator who desired to reserve any amendment could do so, and those amendments which any Senator desired (there were three certainly) were reserved. The Chair then put the question upon all the other amendments in bulk; and they were concurred in; and then the Chair put the question upon the three reserved amendments separately. Now the Senator from Maryland can move to reconsider the vote by which the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were agreed to in bulk. The motion to concur in those amendments is a motion which the Senate has adopted, and therefore it is capable of reconsideration; but you cannot move to reconsider a quarter of a vote. You must move to reconsider the whole or none at all. If the only motion which I apprehend is in order prevails, to reconsider the amendments concurred in in bulk, then all the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole, except the reserved ones, are open for the consideration of the Senate and the bill is practically back in Committee of the Whole again.

Mr. WHYTE. This question shall not go upon a point of order. I move, therefore, to reconsider the vote by which all the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were adopted in gross in the Senate, with the view only of offering this proposition afterward.

Mr. ANTHONY. That motion is entirely in order. Now, for the sake of being enlightened, I should like to know what is the purpose of the Senator from Maryland in making that motion? What amendment does he propose to make?

Mr. WHYTE. I have already stated.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know, but I did not hear it fully.

Mr. WHYTE. It is to reduce the appropriation for printing for the Interior Department, the Post-Office Department, and the War Department $50,000 in the aggregate. This is for printing the blanks. I am satisfied that if a proper investigation is made of the Congressional Printing Office it can be reduced next year one-half for that purpose, at least 40 per cent.

Mr. ANTHONY. If Congress will repeal the law by which we pay to the printers here an excess, estimated by the employing printers rather largely I think, but estimated by them in testimony which was given before the Committee on Printing at 56 per cent. above the wages paid elsewhere, and if we will exact of the men who work for the Government the same number of hours of labor that are exacted of men who work for other employers, I have no doubt we can reduce the expense of public printing 25 per cent. The reason why it has not been reduced is the fault of Congress. We pass a law by which a man that is employed by the Government shall receive higher wages for working eight hours than a man who is employed by individuals receives for working ten hours, and then we complain that the cost of the Government printing is more than the cost of private printing. It is more, of course, and the fault is our own.

Mr. WHYTE. No, Mr. President, there is another reason. The mode of charging the Departments is not a proper mode. Stereotyped plates are used to print blanks, and when the blanks are reprinted the Departments are charged for composition over and over again. I have taken the trouble to examine it carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole which were concurred in in gross.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the vote will not be reconsidered, and I think there is no necessity for it. If there is, and the bill is re-opened to amendment, to discussion, and a vote upon each proposition, we shall not probably get through with it before midnight to-night, and perhaps not this week. So far as this question is concerned on the appropriation for printing in the various Departments, I think I am safe in saying that it does not exceed last year's. There is no extravagance in this appropriation. There may possibly be a re-arrangement of the items so that in some cases there is a difference, but I think the total is the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I submit an amendment to come in after line 1206:

For the expenses of the investigation of the late election in Mississippi, $2,500.

The appropriation was $10,000. Of that sum there has been expended $8,000. The reporters have not been paid. The precise amount that will be due them is not now known; but it is pretty certain that the $10,000 will not be sufficient; and therefore I ask that this additional appropriation be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer one more amendment, and I believe it is the last. I move to insert a clause after line 1647. The committee struck out a similar provision, but upon further information find that there is a law providing for the service; they desire to re-instate substantially the same proposition. I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the act of March 3, 1875, to provide for the sale of the buildings and grounds known as the Detroit arsenal, in the State of Michigan, by appraising and surveying the property and advertising its sale, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONOVER. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota to withdraw his point of order in regard to the amendment I offered a little while ago.

Mr. WINDOM. I am informed that there is an estimate for it, and therefore the point of order does not apply.

Mr. CONOVER. There is an estimate in the book before me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is on page 37, after line 893, to insert:

For the protection of the naval timber lands, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I rise to offer an amendment. We had a discussion here to-day on an amendment in reference to the commissioner to the international penitentiary congress. It appeared by the statements of the Senator from Maine, by the letter from Governor Seymour, and by other facts, that the commissioner, Mr. Wines, acting under the commission of the President, and in view of the act of Congress making an appropriation of $8,000, actually expended from two to three thousand dollars. Now he is a poor man, and I am free to say that I believe there is not a Senator on this floor who, had he given Mr. Wines the encouragement that the Government gave him to believe that the expenses which he defrayed out of his own pocket were to come out of that appropriation of $8,000, would not pay Mr. Wines that money, if it was the last $3,000 he had in the world.

Now, ending this whole commission, making no appropriation for the future, I propose this amendment.

That the sum of $3,000, or such part thereof as may have been expended by E. C. Wines when acting under the supposed authority of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875, be, and is hereby, appropriated to pay such expenditure.

I hope that may receive the approval of the Senate.

Mr. BOGY. He expended money on his own account, expended money for the purpose of preliminary preparation to educate himself. A man can travel all over Europe for less than $3,000. He certainly had no right to go all over Europe. All he was expected to do, if he went at all, was to go to one place. The whole thing is an effort here to get money out of the Treasury to enable this gentleman to go to Europe whenever he may take it into his head to go there. I think it is rather a small effort of my friend from New Jersey. We have passed upon a thing once already after discussion. I do not see why another effort should be made to force into the pockets of this gentleman money to pay his expenses when traveling in Europe. He was unauthorized to go there. Even the amendment itself speaks of a supposed authority. He had no right to misconstrue the resolution. He was appointed to go to the city of Rome to attend a convention. No convention was held there; and therefore he had no right to go. The whole thing seems to me to be only an effort to pay the expenses of a gentleman traveling in Europe.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is an effort to have the United States act fairly. While the Senator from Missouri may think it is a small way, I think it is a very small way for the Government to act. They may do what they please as to future expenditures. They passed an appropriation of $8,000, which Governor Seymour says in his letter was understood to apply to the expenses of this commissioner, and he so understood it, but by reason of a very close construction of the statute it was held by the Secretary of State not to reach his case except while he was in actual attendance on the congress. Such expenses as were incidental to his traveling in order to create an interest in this subject were disallowed; and the application of Governor Seymour is that they shall be allowed. My friend says it is a small way to do things. Why, Governor SWANN and Horatio Seymour both appeared before the Appropriation Committee, I am informed, urging this matter as a just claim of this man; and it seems to me that if we pay out of this appropriation that is made the money which he has actually paid out of his own pocket, supposing—I use that word intentionally—that it was within the appropriation, we do nothing more than simple justice. The Secretary of State will be careful to see that no part of this $3,000 is expended unless it comes within the description of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT TAX BILL.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following report.

The committee of conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes of the same upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to said bill and agree thereto, amended as follows:

First. In section 1, line 9, after the word "the" insert the word "assessed."

Second. In section 4, lines 28 and 29, strike out the words "on such part or parcel of land as said tax relates to."

Third. Section 4, line 29, strike out the word "law" and insert the words "this act."

Fourth. Section 4, line 21, after the word "every" insert the word "secular."

Fifth. Section 7, line 12, after the word "accrue" insert the following words:

"And for want of such goods and chattels said collector may levy upon and sell at auction in like manner the estate and interest of such person, firm, association, or corporation in any parcel of land in said District, and in that case the proceedings as to such land subsequent to sale shall be the same as in the case of taxes against real estate as in this act provided."

Sixth. Section 8, line 9, strike out the word "said" and insert the word "such."

Seventh. Section 8, lines 20, 21, and 22, strike out the words "the stock, so far as the individual owner is concerned, of any corporation which is taxed on its capital in said District, sixthly."

Eighth. Section 10, lines 40 to 45 inclusive, strike out the following words: "And the person so refusing shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, to which may be added imprisonment not exceeding thirty days."

Ninth. Section 10, lines 50 to 53 inclusive, strike out the following words: "And if the return provided for in this act shall not be made by any firm, each member thereof resident of said District shall be liable to the penalties of this act."

Tenth. Section 11, line 5, after the word "value" insert the words "and the shares in the same shall not be assessed against the individual owners thereof."

Eleventh. Section 12, line 26, strike out the word "thereunder."

Twelfth. Section 12, insert at the end thereof the following words: "In case the assessors shall fail to complete any of the duties in this act to be by them performed within the times provided therefor, the taxation provided by this act shall not by reason thereof be invalid, but such assessors shall proceed with all reasonable diligence to complete such duties, and their acts shall be valid, as if performed within the times fixed therefor."

Thirteenth. Section 19, strike out the whole section and insert:

That the twenty-third section of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act imposing a license on trades, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia," approved August 23, 1871, clauses 20 and 35 of the twenty-first section of said act and clause 16 of said twenty-first section of said act as amended by the act amendatory thereof, approved June 20, 1872, and all other laws and acts, or parts thereof, inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
T. J. ROBERTSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LAWRENCE T. NEAL,
JULIAN HARTRIDGE,
GEORGE WILLARD,
Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will merely say that this report is in substance in every particular what the Senate agreed to in the amendment which it adopted to the House bill. The only difference that can be said to approach substance is that we struck out the clause that provides for a criminal punishment for a person who does not return his list, leaving the assessors to assess on their own judgment and information, and add 50 per cent., not making it a crime to fail to return the list. I believe in every other respect that touches substance this is the amendment as agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object of striking out "such part or parcel of land as said tax relates to?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason is that in the place where that phrase occurred it ran the tax on personal estate and the tax on realty, in respect to which the real-estate tax was a lien, together; and we have provided in another section for the personal tax separately and to allow that to be collected out of the personal estate of the man who owes it, and also for the want of personal estate out of his real estate. To guard against any misunderstanding we struck that out, so that that section applies solely to the tax on real estate, and that made those words unnecessary there.

The report was concurred in.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Pinchback resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Oregon to allow me, if he will, to ask to have taken up a bill which will take but a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me to get the resolution up.
Mr. CONKLING. It is up.
Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Pinchback resolution up?
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CRAGIN in the chair.) The Senator from Oregon moves that the resolution in regard to Mr. Pinchback's pay be now taken up.
Mr. BAYARD. Has the Chair declared the passage of the sundry civil appropriation bill?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was passed.
Mr. BAYARD. An amendment that I offered was reconsidered; and it seems to me that in order it should either have been rejected or adopted before the passage of the bill.
Mr. CONKLING. It was laid on the table on a motion which escaped the Senator.
Mr. SHERMAN. I made the statement that I thought, as it contained legislative provisions and was controverted, it had better lie on the table, and I made that motion. The Senator was present but may not have heard it.
Mr. BAYARD. I did not hear it at the time.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was made and carried to lay the amendment on the table. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to Mr. Pinchback's pay.
Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Oregon to yield to me a moment to pass a bill which is of public importance, but will only take a moment.
Mr. CONKLING. I do not want to object to my friend, but I have a prior claim to take up a bill which will take about one minute by the watch.
Mr. ALLISON. This will take but half a minute by the watch.
Mr. CONKLING. I made my request first.
Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the resolution will be taken up.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to take up for consideration the resolution named by him.
The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMER.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I ask having permission of the Senator from Oregon, to take up a little bill to change the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce a good while ago, and to which I think there can be no objection.
By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 702) for changing the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America was considered as in Committee of the Whole.
The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. ALLISON. I now ask the Senator from Oregon to yield to me that I may ask to take from the table House bill No. 3839. It is very important that the bill should pass to-night.
Mr. MITCHELL. I yield for that purpose.
The bill (H. R. No. 3839) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market was read for information. It authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase in open market, without the usual advertisement, for immediate use of the Indian tribes, such supplies as are required, to an extent not exceeding $150,000, which is appropriated for the purpose to serve until the regular appropriation bill shall be passed and approved, and the time now required by law for advertising and acceptance of proposals shall have elapsed. The sum so expended is to be deducted from the appropriate sums respectively appropriated under the regular appropriation bill when passed.
Mr. ALLISON. I desire to explain in a moment the object of this bill. Under existing law the Commissioner of Indian Affairs can only purchase supplies after advertisement for thirty days. The fiscal year begins to-day. It is absolutely necessary that temporary supplies should be furnished at certain places. The House of Representatives have authorized him to use $150,000 for that purpose, which shall be deducted from the regular appropriations when made, and allowed him to purchase in open market to that extent these necessary temporary supplies for the Indian service. I hope there will be no objection to the bill, as it ought to pass to-night.
Mr. MORTON. If it gives rise to any argument I shall call for the regular order.
There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the first and second amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, and had disagreed to the third amendment of the Senate to the said bill, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. R. GOODIN of Kansas, Mr. B. S. FULLER of Indiana, and Mr. J. W. MCDILL of Iowa, managers at the conference on its part.
The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing Congress to meet in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on the Fourth of July, 1876; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up the House joint resolution No. 139.
Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.
Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a privileged motion.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to lay before the Senate a House bill.
Mr. INGALLS. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, and agree to the request of the House for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.
The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee.
Messrs. INGALLS, HITCHCOCK, and EATON were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

FURLOUGH TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) granting a furlough to employés in the Government Printing Office and others.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the resolution will be read.
The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the employés in the Government Printing Office be, and they are hereby, granted a furlough of twenty days without loss of wages, that they may have an opportunity of attending the centennial exposition; that a furlough of one week without reduction of pay be allowed to the employés of the other Executive Departments for attendance at the centennial exposition at such times as in the judgment of the chief officer of said Departments it may be done without detriment to the public service.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want everybody to go to the Centennial, and I think it would be well enough to offer a proviso for an appropriation to authorize every able-bodied citizen of the United States to go from his home, where he is engaged in private pursuits, to Philadelphia and enjoy for one week the hospitalities of that city and the fare of the crowded hotels there, and to pay him a reasonable price for it. There is no reason why because a man is an officer of the Government of the United States he should be invited at the expense of the Government to go to attend the centennial celebration. I have as much sympathy for those in the employ of the Government as anybody ought to have; I think I have as much as most persons have; but there is no reason why we should discriminate in favor of a person holding an office and pay his expenses to the centennial, because the practical effect of this is to give him for twenty days or whatever the time may be the wages allotted to him for his services while he goes to the Centennial. It is a great deal better for us to appropriate money enough to add to the limited supply of the poor people of this country who by hard labor are hardly able to collect money enough in the course of a year to pay their expenses, rather than pay those of persons who are liberally paid by the Government of the United States. Whatever may be said about it, the Government of the United States pays more for all employments, except the highest, than any other employer in the United States of America. We have an eight-hour law as to the Government employés; we have a higher rate of wages for Government employés, except only those who perform what are supposed to be the highest functions of official life.
Under the circumstances, for us to suspend all the operations of the Government and pay all our employés, postmasters, and everybody else their wages, while they go to Philadelphia, is an extraordinary proposition, to say the least. Although some people may think it is hypocritical, I have no doubt it was actuated by kindly feelings and good motives. No doubt my friend from Illinois thinks it will be a kind and generous thing to do to the Government employés; and yet it seems to me that it will neither be popular with the mass of the people who do not hold office but who attend to their business and add to the wealth of this country by their private employment, nor will it be right and just to the employés themselves. I am opposed to all discriminations in favor of employés as against the mass of the people of the United States. I am opposed to your eight-hour law when it is applied to Government employés and not to private citizens. I am opposed to every discrimination in favor of those who, after earnest seeking, hold public office.
Now, Mr. President, the best thing we can do with this bill, in my judgment, is to lay it upon the table. I do not make the motion now if any Senator desires to speak.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking it up.
Mr. SHERMAN. Then I shall vote against taking it up. I supposed it was taken up and was pending and so I made my speech a little ahead of time.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A single objection will prevent its being taken up now.
Mr. SHERMAN. If a single objection will do it, I would rather object myself. I do not want to cut off my friend from Illinois making any remarks on the subject, but if a single objection will prevent its consideration I will make it when he gets through, if I do not waive my right to make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I withhold it.

Mr. LOGAN. I have but a word to say. As far as the question of popularity is concerned, it did not occur to me at all. I do not suppose any person would be advanced very much by voting to extend a kindness to men who hardly ever vote and who have so little to do with elections as those in the Printing Office here.

Mr. SHERMAN. It applies to all employés, as I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. It applies to the printers in the Public Printing Office and to the clerks in the Departments at the discretion of the heads of the Departments. That is the language of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. May I ask my friend from Illinois does it apply to the clerks in the Departments at Washington alone, or to all clerks?

Mr. LOGAN. The best way to understand it is to have it read again.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to ask a question of my friend from Illinois whether in the Government Printing Office most of the employés do not work by the piece, so much for what they do of a particular kind of work; and, consequently, if they are absent their wages are stopped?

Mr. SPENCER. I think they work by the day; and, if they are absent a day, they lose their wages.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot give the information, for I know nothing about how they are employed. This resolution passed the House, which appears to be the economical body of this country now, and this is part of the evidence of it. A committee of very nice gentlemen waited on me, and I thought it was not very wrong to give them this time, and they asked me as a favor to call up the bill. I said I would do so. I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask as a matter of fact what is the rule in the Departments about the length of leave of absence to which the clerks are entitled in a year.

Mr. LOGAN and others. Thirty days.

Mr. WEST. Thirty days with pay.

Mr. CONKLING. And what in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think they have any leave in the Government Printing Office. I do not know that fact; but I have been told they do not grant leaves of absence in the Printing Office; but in all the other Departments the clerks have thirty days with pay. If the leave of absence is longer than thirty days, no pay is given for the time beyond the thirty days. This adds five days in this year for this purpose to the Government clerks over and above their thirty days, and gives to the printers in the Public Printing Office the time that is allowed to other employés. That is the way I understand the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. It occurs to me that as the dead lock between the House and Senate has been because the Senate has resisted the scaling down below the possibility of living of the clerks and employés of the Government, we resisting the proposition made by the House as one of rigid economy, this is a very singular bill to be sent to us from the House at the present time.

Mr. LOGAN. I admit all that, but at the same time I am for it. If the bill was left to me, I would probably not have introduced it. I think it is a very strange bill to come from the House, but not a strange bill for the Senate, because the Senate has been willing to do justice and right to these clerks all the time.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe that; but while it is a question whether we can really get them a decent living in exchange for a fair day's work, it seems to me we had better wait before passing this bill. I do not believe in giving men cake and luxuries while we are depriving them of the absolute necessaries of life. Let us secure their right to live at all, and then we can talk about giving them holidays.

Mr. LOGAN. Uniformly in this body since I have been here—I do not know that I had the opportunity in the other House before I came here, but if I had I certainly acted in the same line—I have not been one of those representatives of the people who have always been talking about high salaries, and trying to cut down a few dollars for the purpose of demagoging before the country. I despise that kind of demagogism, for it is very small and very cheap. The people of this country in intelligence look upon it as being very small and very cheap. I never have voted in this Senate for a reduction of salaries. I never have believed they were too high; I do not believe they are to-day; but I see the attempt made. Here are Senators getting $5,000 a year for sitting here and working day and night. I believe they are as hard worked a set of men as there are in the United States, and they get less money than their ability would bring them in a common mercantile house, in a railroad office, or anywhere else; and yet we find a certain class of gentlemen who are so eager to please their constituents that they want to cut down 10 per cent. one year and then commence back the next year. I call that demagogism of the smallest kind and character; and the cutting down of a poor clerk's pay $50 when he gets but $1,500, is a piece of the smallest, least, petty demagogism that I ever knew of anywhere in a deliberative body.

When men go before their constituents and show them that the pay is only what it ought to be and that they can hardly live on it, if we have intelligent constituents, those constituents will sustain them always. If my constituents think that I am not legislating properly when I refuse to reduce a salary that is only $5,000 down to $4,500, when I know the man cannot pay his expenses out of it, they can correct me. They will have to instruct me certainly if they do get me to vote for any such thing, for it is not the correct kind of legislation. The legislation that is attempted this session is legislation for the purpose of obtaining the labor of men who are not qualified to perform the duty, getting clerks in the Departments here at a small amount of money, men that cannot be employed at home perhaps to do anything. That is the class of men you will get when you give them inadequate pay, and the class of men you will get in these Chambers, too, when you do not pay properly. Poor men who have nothing but their reputation and ability cannot come here to legislate for the people if they are not compensated, and the result is to give the legislation into the hands of the rich and deprive the poor of a chance. That has been the tendency in legislation here for a while, and an attempt is made now to legislate so that bankers and merchants and railroad men and rich men can come here and legislate for themselves instead of legislating for the people. That is the result that will be produced. You legislate to bring here a class of business men in this country that have an income sufficient to enable them to come here and spend their time, and their legislation is always for themselves. That has always been the experience of this country and every other when people were called to legislate because they received no pay for it or to do any duty for which they were not paid properly.

As I said, I am willing to give these clerks this allowance. I agree with the Senator from California that it is strange legislation for the House. They cry economy all the time until they think they can make a little political capital, and then they do not care what it costs. I have no doubt this bill will cost the Government some money, and I am willing to vote it and give these employés the time, because I believe the clerks here do their duty, are hard worked, and I believe they are just as much entitled to go to see the centennial exposition as anybody else. They are poor and have not the money, and I am willing to vote them twenty days' time that they may go. I do not do it on the ground of economy, for I am not one of the men always crying economy and then voting all the money I can get a chance to vote away. I believe in salaries that will pay men for the labor they perform. I do not want to give them extravagant salaries, but to deal fairly and honestly with them. I do not believe in demagogism, I do not care whether it comes from republicans or democrats. I hate a demagogue and always have and always shall.

Mr. MORTON. I do not agree with the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio. People in private business can go and come when they please, according to their ability; but if these clerks leave their places without permission, they are in danger of losing their offices. Their case is, therefore, somewhat different from the case of people who are engaged in private business.

It is said that the clerks in the Departments have a leave of thirty days every year without a loss of pay, but that the employés in the Printing Office have no leave at all. I trust, therefore, that they will be allowed to go there and see the exhibition if they desire to do so, and that additional facilities will be extended to the clerks in the Departments. I hope the people of the United States will generally go there and see that exposition. I think Congress adjourned about a month and a half ago for some days, and most of the members went there. I went myself. We adjourned over, I think, three or four days, and, if my recollection is correct, we adjourned once last winter and went over there and had a reception and a banquet given us. I suppose they will hardly give the clerks a banquet. But there has been no objection on the part of Congress to an adjournment even when the exhibition was not going forward as an exhibition or was just opening, and I think it would hardly be liberal to deny this to the clerks. Let us do by them as we are willing to do by ourselves.

Mr. ANTHONY. When we adjourned to go to Philadelphia we necessarily prolonged the session by just the number of days that we took an adjournment for. If we take the money of the people to give this favor to the employés of the Government of one description, why are we not bound to do the same for the other employés? Why not the employés of the navy-yards and the arsenals; why not those in the custom-houses and in the post-offices? Why confine it to those in the city of Washington? Is an employé of the Government in the city of Washington entitled to more consideration than one in Indianapolis or Providence? Why should they not all go?

Then, again, I would respectfully suggest why should a man who is in the employ of the Government receive a favor that is not given to one that is not in the employ of the Government? It seems to me that in order to make the proposition fair and equal it should be extended to all the citizens of the United States, and as I am a woman's rights man, I should say, without distinction of sex, all should have a chance to go to the Centennial, and the week's or twenty days' furlough should be paid for by the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island one question. The Senator is a very frank man and certainly is as devoid of anything like unfairness as any gentleman I know; but does he think that is a fair argument to say "extend it to all citizens of the United States?" The citizens of the United States are free; they can do as they please. These people are not; they cannot go unless they have permission, and that permission has to be by a law of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Grant them permission; but we grant them permission without rebate of pay. In effect we pay them their expenses.

Mr. LOGAN. So you do; but every officer of the United States Government in the Army or Navy under the law to-day is entitled to thirty days' leave every year on pay. So you have a law in reference to all your employés in the Post-Office Department. The post-office in your own town gives thirty days' leave of absence; so they do in mine and everywhere else.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do the private soldiers have it, or the officers only?

Mr. LOGAN. Officers, and private soldiers too.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does a private soldier have thirty days' leave of absence every year?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember that he does. That depends upon whether the officers grant it or not; but leaves of absence are always granted in the Army to men who do their duty, whether private soldiers or officers. We have a law giving them absolutely thirty days' leave of absence where they can go, and the officer cannot prevent them. It applies to all officers of the Government. So I do not see any great hardship in this. A few printers here do not get leave of absence, and this is to allow them to have it and to give five days more to the clerks in the Departments at a time when the heads of Departments think they can spare them from their employment. A few can go at a time. I do not think there is anything wrong in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the House joint resolution moved by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let the Senate take a vote upon it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will let the Senate decide the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to take up this joint resolution for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Ferry, Hitchcock, Logan, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, and Windom—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Ingalls, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, West, Whyte, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. So the motion was not agreed to.

MEETING IN INDEPENDENCE HALL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a joint resolution from the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on the 5th instant. I want an opportunity to have the motion voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will give the opportunity.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) authorizing Congress to meet in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on the 4th of July, 1876, was read the first time. It declares that the two Houses of Congress will meet in joint convention in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on July 4, 1876, at nine o'clock a. m., for the purpose of passing appropriate resolutions in commemoration of the great event which in that same hall one hundred years ago brought this nation into being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be considered read the second time——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want it considered read the second time.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to taking it up.

COURTS IN FOURTH CIRCUIT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 769) to alter and appoint the times for holding the circuit court of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the amendments, with the bill, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

FOX RIVER IMPROVEMENT—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a message from the President of the United States on the table, which the Chair will submit.

The Chief Clerk read the following message:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith without my approval Senate bill No. 672, entitled "An act to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress."

The objections to affixing my signature to this bill may be found in the report, which accompanies this message, of the Chief of Engineers of the Army to the Secretary of War.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 30, 1876.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the $25,000 which, under the second section of the act entitled "An act to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin," approved March 3, 1875, is appropriated to the payment of the property taken under said act as is required to pay the salaries of commissioners appointed by the court to assess the damages for the property so taken and other necessary legal fees may be applied by the Secretary of War to such uses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear read the papers to which the message refers.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, June 28, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill No. 692 to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress, and beg to invite your attention to the report of the Chief of Engineers, dated the 27th instant, copy inclosed, and for the reasons stated in said report it is believed the bill should not become a law.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, June 27, 1876.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War.

An act to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin, approved March 3, 1875, contains the following clause:

"In case any lands or other property is now or shall be flowed or injured by means of any part of the works of said improvement heretofore or hereafter constructed for which compensation is now or shall become legally owing and in the opinion of the officer in charge it is not prudent that the dam or dams be lowered, the amount of such compensation may be ascertained in like manner," &c.

The dams referred to in the above clause are at the outlets of Lake Winnebago, known as the Neenah or Menasha channels of the lower Fox River.

The officer of the Department of Justice appointed under the provisions of the act referred to to represent the interests of the United States in legal proceedings "for flowage damages hereinbefore described," acting apparently under the assumption that, because the dams in question had not been lowered, it was the opinion of the officer in charge that they should not be lowered, has had such surveys, investigations, &c., made as were deemed necessary by him to protect the interests of the United States, and under this action it is understood that, at the instance of claimants, judges of the circuit court have appointed commissioners to decide on the amount of compensation due, and the judges have fixed the rate of compensation the commissioners are to receive. These commissioners are not appointed at the instance of the United States.

In this way the awards for damages have already been made to the amount of $70,000, and ultimately a much larger sum will be claimed to be due from the United States.

The officer of engineers in charge of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers reports that the dams which have occasioned the flowage were not constructed by the canal companies and are not at all necessary for the purposes of navigation, and, so far as that is concerned, could not only be lowered but entirely dispensed with.

They were built by private parties solely for their own use and profit and for water-power purposes, and have raised the water-level and caused the flowage, for which they should be held liable.

In view of the preceding facts, and for the additional reason that the subject of the liability of the United States is now being investigated by the Department of Justice, it is respectfully suggested that the inclosed act to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress (S. 692) should not become a law.

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the message and the bill lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INVITATION TO PHILADELPHIA FOR JULY FOURTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a written invitation on the part of the Centennial Commission to the Senate of the United States, inviting the Senate to be present at Philadelphia at the ceremonies on the Fourth of July, Tuesday next. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1876,
UNITED STATES CENTENNIAL COMMISSION,
Philadelphia, June 29, 1876.

SIR: The United States Centennial Commission respectfully invite the Senate of the United States to attend the national commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, in Independence Square, Philadelphia, July 4, at ten a. m. The necessary cards have been sent to the members individually. The programme is inclosed with the communication.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
President United States Centennial Commission.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,
President of the United States Senate.

The letter was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill 892.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon calls for the regular order.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator will defer that a few moments. I am sure this bill——

Mr. MORTON. There has been one measure after another thrust in for an hour. The regular order could have been settled by this time. I must therefore insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the Pinchback resolution.

Several SENATORS. "Question."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand my colleague has the floor upon that question and desires to be heard upon it. He is not now in the Hall.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is just coming in.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the resolution before the Senate to pay $20,000 to Pinchback?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution to compensate Mr. Pinchback is before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to submit some remarks in opposition, but I would rather not do it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move, then, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that we may have an executive session for a few moments. I have asked it two or three times.

Mr. MITCHELL. I give way for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 1, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FORFEITED RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, with a view to action on certain Senate amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863.

There being no objection, the amendments were read, as follows:

In line 2 strike out "sixth" and insert "third."

In line 13 strike out "which has expired by limitation of law" and insert "or earned by the completion of said road and to which said company are not lawfully entitled."

In line 15 strike out all after the word "to" down to and including "States" at the end of the bill, and insert "be disposed of under the provisions of law relating to the public lands of the United States."

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the bill read as amended.

Mr. GOODIN. If the House will bear with me a moment I will state that this bill as it passed the House declared forfeited certain lands granted to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company of Kansas for the construction of its road. The company having failed to construct its road within the time prescribed by the act, the bill declared the lands forfeited to the United States, and further declared that they should be subject to entry only under the provisions of the homestead law. All the amendments which have been read, except the third, are merely formal and do not affect the sense of the bill. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made his suggestion I was about to move that the House concur in those formal amendments, and then I desired to move non-concurrence in the third amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. GOODIN. Its effect is this: As I have stated, the bill as it passed the House provided that these lands should be disposed of only under the provisions of the homestead law. The Senate has struck out that provision and provided for opening up these lands generally, so that they may be taken by private entry. This House, not only upon this bill, but upon several others, has expressed its judgment that the agricultural lands of the United States, so far as possible, should be disposed of under the homestead law. That is not the opinion of the Senate. I desire the House to non-concur in the third amendment, that we may have a conference with the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's explanation is very satisfactory.

Mr. GOODIN. I move that the first and second amendments be concurred in, and that the third amendment be non-concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOODIN. I move that the House ask a conference with the Senate upon this question.

The motion was agreed to.

ENTRIES AND CLEARANCES ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, ETC.

Mr. KEHR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 369) to exempt vessels engaged in navigating the Mississippi River and its tributaries above the port of New Orleans from entries and clearances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. KEHR. I have no purpose to detain the House with a detailed statement of the reasons rendering the passage of this bill desirable, beyond stating that the sections of the statute sought to be modified were brought down from the ship and vessel act of 1793, somewhat amended in 1819, and were carried into the revision of 1873. They were intended to apply only to the coasting trade, and have found application only to vessels in that trade. The terms employed are nevertheless sufficiently broad to embrace vessels navigating the western waters between the districts named in section 4349, having distilled spirits or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture on board. Yet, although within its letter, the statute has never been applied to the Mississippi and its tributaries, and had indeed become completly obsolete, until in 1875 an attempt was made to enforce it upon the Upper Mississippi. The object of the pending bill is to relieve and release vessels engaged in river commerce from the onerous and entirely useless burden of entry and clearance, a burden in nowise necessary to the security of the public revenue, but involving loss and delay to commerce and vexation and detention to the masters and owners of vessels. While the bill was pending before the Senate it was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose reply attests the fact that the provisions of the statute recited in the bill have never been applied to the steamboats navigating the western waters, and that there is in his opinion no objection to the passage of the bill. I will state further that the bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Commerce. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and passed.

DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

Mr. BUCKNER. Some days ago the Committee for the District of Columbia submitted a report on affairs in the District, which was ordered to be printed and recommitted. A minority report was also ordered to be printed. Owing to the condition of the business of the House, by order of the committee I ask that the order to recommit made by the House be reconsidered, and that the reports and accompanying resolutions be printed in the RECORD; and that any member of the committee may have the privilege of printing such remarks thereon as he may desire. And next Thursday I will ask that the reports be considered and that the resolutions reported by the committee be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose that the gentleman from Missouri would be willing to have the privilege of printing remarks extended to any member of the House as well as members of the committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; I ask that any member of the House may have the privilege of printing remarks on the reports and resolutions.

Mr. HENDEE. It seems to me that in order to save time the gentleman might ask a vote on the resolutions at this time as well as on Thursday next.

Mr. BUCKNER. I prefer not to ask a vote to-day. I desire that before voting on the resolutions the House may acquaint itself with the facts when the reports are printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia was recommitted to that committee, and asks that next Thursday be fixed as the day for the consideration of the resolutions reported by it.

Mr. BUCKNER. And for a vote on the resolutions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When was the report recommitted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair is informed, on Monday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it not too late now to make a motion to reconsider unless the motion was then entered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion was entered at the time. The gentleman from Missouri also asks that both reports be printed in the RECORD, and that members of the House may be at liberty to print such remarks as they may desire to have printed in connection with this subject.

Mr. KASSON. Will the Chair state what the reports and resolutions refer to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To affairs in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the general proposition to give leave to print all speeches on that subject.

Mr. KASSON. I hardly think it necessary to print these documents in the RECORD. The report seems to be a document published in the ordinary way, and I do not see that it is necessary that it should go into the RECORD.

Mr. BUCKNER. The committee would have the right to have the reports read. It is merely to save time that I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KASSON. There can be no objection to printing the resolutions in the RECORD, but the duplicate printing of the report is a needless expense when we can get it from the document-room.

Mr. FORT. I think it should be understood that the remarks to be printed on the subject be published without delay, so that gentlemen may have the pleasure of reading them in due time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It seems to me that there should be a discussion of this question in the House before we are compelled to vote upon it. I understand that the resolutions of the majority inculpate certain officers.

Mr. HENDEE. I will say for the information of the gentleman from New York that the resolutions do not inculpate any one, and that they have been agreed upon unanimously by the committee. The resolution which originally formed a part of the report of Judge BUCKNER did order the prosecution of certain officials of the District. That resolution has now been abandoned, and a resolution has been unanimously agreed upon directing the Attorney-General to investigate the matter, and to take such action in the premises as he may deem proper under the law and the facts.

Mr. KASSON. This being the unanimous report of the committee, why should we not vote upon it this morning and dispose of it to-day instead of next Friday? It appears to me that there is no need of discussion if it be a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. I take it that the committee would desire to ask the sense of the House on the reports presented by the committee; on the substitution of one for the other. And the object of my motion is that the House may be enlightened as to the facts of the case, and that instead of taking up the time of the House in discussing the question, gentlemen may have an opportunity of seeing the facts presented on each side by reading both of these reports when printed in the RECORD. I therefore insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first put the question on the motion to reconsider the vote recommitting the report. That will bring the matter before the House, and the House can then dispose of it as it sees fit.

Mr. HENDEE. I wish to correct an error into which my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] may have fallen. The reports from the committee are statements of facts. The resolutions are the unanimous report of the committee. My idea is that the only vote required from the House is on the adoption of the resolutions recommended by the committee. The committee is unanimous in that recommendation. But the statement of facts found by five members of the committee in the report submitted by Judge BUCKNER is very different from the statement of facts found by the majority of the committee in the report which I presented, and which has been printed. The two reports are printed together in document form, and can be readily obtained and read by each member of the House. And if the only vote to be taken is upon the resolutions which have been proposed by the committee unanimously and not upon the facts as differently presented in the two reports, then as a matter of course the vote may be taken this morning just as well as at any other time. And if the Chair should so rule, I would ask that the vote be taken now.

The question was taken on reconsidering the order of the House by which the report was recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on recommitting the report to the Committee for the District of Columbia; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say to the House that, according to my idea as to what would be proper, the House would have the right to have the reports of the committee read in order that the House might give a vote upon the question when the House gives its vote upon one report or the other, in order that the House may be informed by the committee on both sides or on all sides, for there are three reports; and we propose that discussion shall be waived and that members shall have the privilege to print their remarks, and that a vote shall be taken on Thursday next.

Mr. HUBBELL. I understand that the committee have agreed to the resolutions before the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is true.

Mr. HUBBELL. Then I ask what effect the reading of these reports will have upon the passage of the resolutions? All branches of the committee agreed upon the resolutions.

Mr. BUCKNER. Before the report of the committee is acted upon and the resolutions reported, according to the views of many gentlemen it would be proper that we should have the entire reports, both of the majority and minority, read.

Mr. HUBBELL. But the result of both reports is the reporting of two resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will desire the resolutions of the committee to be read, so that they may be before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, 1. That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, instructed to certify to the Attorney-General of the United States a copy of this report, with the accompanying evidence, for such action in the premises as he may deem proper under the law and the facts as developed in said testimony.

2. That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, further instructed to certify a copy of the evidence accompanying this report to the grand jury of the District of Columbia, with directions to investigate the criminal charges against parties referred to in said evidence as having been guilty of a violation of the criminal laws of the United States; and the Attorney-General is also directed, by the aid of such special counsel as he may appoint, to institute such proceedings as he may deem proper under the evidence to recover any and all sums of money due the District of Columbia which have been obtained illegally or improperly by any parties mentioned in said evidence.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. These resolutions are introduced by the whole committee, and I desire to know whether, if the House adopts the majority or minority report, we have the right to take the views of the House as to the adoption of either report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. BURCHARD of Illinois. It is not material what the views of gentlemen of the House may be in passing upon the conclusions of the entire committee, which are these resolutions. If they are in favor of or against the resolution, it is no matter on what grounds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that here are two reports of a different character, but with the same conclusions. Now, it is entirely proper for any gentleman to demand that one or the other of the reports be adopted, even though they agree to the same resolutions.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is what we propose to do, to take a vote on the views of the different branches of the committee, and in the mean time the report shall go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and be printed, and that the members of the committee and other members shall be allowed to print remarks on the subject.

Mr. KASSON. I think there is still a little misapprehension in reference to this matter. As to the mode of arriving at the conclusions of the committee in this matter the House has not the slightest jurisdiction, for the evidence is not here, and how can we vote on the facts when there is no evidence. The same resolution is reported by the majority and minority, and if the House agrees to these same resolutions, it is not necessary to go into the facts; for that reason I object to the going into the matter at this late stage of the session.

Mr. BUCKNER. The House may adopt either the majority or the minority report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to the printing of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is that the members of the committee and others shall be allowed to print their remarks, and that the vote upon the subject shall be taken on Thursday next.

Mr. CONGER. To that I object.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then I desire a vote on my proposition now. I do not suppose it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. What is it?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is to print the reports in the RECORD and to give any gentleman a right to print his speech in the RECORD on the subject, and then we can take up the subject on Thursday morning.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That requires unanimous consent, and objection is made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri to postpone this matter does not require unanimous consent. The proposition to print of course requires unanimous consent, and to that objection is made.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then I withdraw my motion, and ask that this matter be taken up this morning; and I now call for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONGER. At the request of members of the committee I withdraw my objection to allowing gentlemen to print remarks, but I retain the objection to the printing of the reports in the RECORD, because they are already in print.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We can all get them.

Mr. BUCKNER. That will be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then, by unanimous consent, the members of the committee and others who desire to print remarks are authorized to have them printed in the RECORD, and the pending motion is that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Thursday next, at which time the vote shall be taken immediately after the morning hour; not for discussion, but for a vote.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF HOLIDAYS.

Mr. WILLIS, (by request) and by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3835) to establish certain holidays; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Centennial, and ordered to be printed.

BONDED CIGAR FACTORIES.

Mr. MEADE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3836) to establish bonded warehouses for exports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM LONGNECKER.

Mr. McFARLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3837) for the relief of William Longnecker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE G. D. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of R. D. Mussey, making charges against Judge G. D. Humphreys, and moved that it be referred to the special committee on the examination and investigation of charges against Judge Wylie, and it be printed.

Mr. CONGER. Is it proposed to refer that to a special committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To the select committee already existing for the investigation of the charges against Judge Wylie.

Mr. CONGER. The memorial is not to be printed in the RECORD?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, sir.
Mr. KNOTT's motion was agreed to.

JOHN G. TODD.

Mr. LEWIS, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3838) for the relief of John G. Todd, of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying memorial, ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Mr. CUTLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3638) authorizing the Bureau of Education to occupy the Armory building in this District, and making an appropriation for the repair and refitting of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DE BOLT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 92) for the relief of Van B. Bowers, postmaster at Bucklin, Missouri, and that the same be now considered by the House.

Mr. CONGER. I give notice that after this bill is disposed of I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. DE BOLT. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to introduce and have acted upon at this time a bill which is absolutely essential in connection with the Indian Department.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I will yield for that purpose.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATION FOR THE INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. RANDALL. At the suggestion of the committee of conference on the part of the House and Senate upon the Indian appropriation bill, who have been unable to agree as yet, and with the concurrence of such members of the Committee on Appropriations of this House as I have been able to confer with, I now ask leave to introduce the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase in open market, without the usual advertisement, for the immediate use of the Indian tribes, such supplies as are required to an amount not exceeding $150,000, which sum is hereby appropriated for the purpose to serve until the regular appropriation bill shall be passed and approved and the time now required by law for advertisement and acceptance of proposals shall have elapsed; and such sum so expended shall be deducted from the proper sums respectively appropriated in the regular appropriation bill when passed.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3839) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DE BOLT. I now ask that House bill No. 92 be read, and I call for the reading of the report of the committee upon the bill.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. How long will it take to dispose of the bill?

Mr. DE BOLT. Not more than five minutes, I think.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Van B. Bowers, postmaster at Bucklin, Linn County, Missouri, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $126.50, being the amount of postage-stamps, registered letters, and money stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 12th of November, 1874, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred bill H. R. No. 92, for the relief of Van B. Bowers, having duly considered the same, would report thereon:

Van B. Bowers was postmaster at Bucklin, Linn County, Missouri. On the night of October 28, 1874, his office was entered by burglars, the particulars being set forth by the special agent of the Post-Office Department, who was sent to examine the case. The office was kept in a drug-store, a substantial frame building. The robbery was committed by T. W. Peters, a professional burglar, who was convicted and sent to State prison. The entrance was effected by boring holes through the door and removing the fastenings. The robber confessed the crime, and the report of the special agent shows that it was in no way the result of fault or neglect on the part of the postmaster. The office was robbed of one hundred dollars' worth of postage-stamps, $7.50 in money, and one registered letter, No. 8, containing $7.50 in money. Peters also entered two other post-offices in the same way, and stamps thus obtained, amounting to $113, were by him expressed from Macon, Missouri, to Reuben DeBarre, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, who was also arrested, convicted, and sentenced to State prison.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman will explain this bill.

Mr. DE BOLT. The report which has just been read gives a full explanation of it.

Mr. FORT. How does the bill come before the House at this time?

Mr. DE BOLT. I have asked unanimous consent that it be now considered in the House.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman know about the merits of this case?

Mr. DE BOLT. The report gives all the circumstances.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Why should this bill be singled out from others on the Private Calendar? I must object, I think.

Mr. BRADLEY. This bill was before the Committee of Claims, and I had it in charge and examined it myself. There is no question but the postmaster in this case should be allowed the amount recommended in the bill. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WHITE. Will not this bill come up in its regular order on the Calendar when we next go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. WHITE. Then I must object to its being brought up now.

Mr. FORT. As it is now before the House, let it pass.

Mr. WHITE. It is giving a precedence to this bill which is not justifiable.

Mr. FORT. Is not the objection to this bill too late?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection was made immediately on the reading of the report.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I made the objection and I have the right to withdraw it, which I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] has the right to renew it.

Mr. WHITE. I renew the objection for this reason: we should go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and treat all these bills alike.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] to yield to me, that I may call up a message of the Senate asking for another conference on the executive, legislative, and judicial bill.

Mr. FORT. Unless we go on and pass this private bill now, we will lose all the time that has been already taken up on it now.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to disposing of that bill now, but I think that in future all these bills on the Private Calendar should be allowed to take their regular course.

Mr. WHITE. I will withdraw my objection if the House will now go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. This private bill was taken up by unanimous consent for consideration at this time. That consent was given, and the consideration of the bill was entered upon and the bill and the report were read. I submit that after that consent has been once given and the consideration of the bill has been commenced it is too late to raise a point of order against the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the ordinary practice of the Chair has been to allow objection after the bill has been read, and even after the report has been read, if it is called for; because until then gentlemen cannot intelligently object or refrain from objection. Objection was made in time by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN;] and when he withdrew it, it was renewed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE.] The Chair overrules the point of order.

BILLS APPROVED.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries, announced that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 353) to amend section 1911 of the Revised Statutes, defining the jurisdiction of the courts in Washington Territory;

An act (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 2824) to change the name of the steamboat Paragon, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania;

An act (H. R. No. 2849) for the relief of William Rule, postmaster at Knoxville, Tennessee;

An act (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 3809) to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

The message also announced that a bill of the following title, having been received by the President on the 16th of June and not having been returned by him to the House within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his signature:

An act (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis, Kuner, Ziesmann & Zott, Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after free and full conference have been unable to agree.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
WM. M. SPRINGER,
JOHN A. KASSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
T. A. NORWOOD,
LOT M. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to state the principal differences between the House and the Senate on this bill. It is exceedingly important that we should know exactly what the matters of difference are. I put the question partly for my own information (I having been absent by leave of the House for some days) and partly that we may more intelligently approach these difficult matters of controversy and understand the grounds whereon we relatively stand.

Mr. RANDALL. We did not enter upon the details of the bill at all. The difference is upon the second section of the bill, which provides that the salaries fixed in the bill for officers and employés of the Government shall be fixed by law as the salaries for the future, thus changing the law as to salaries.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that the only item of difference?

Mr. RANDALL. That is as far as we got, the Senate claiming that they would not agree to the proposition except upon such clauses of the bill as they might reach in detail where they concurred in the propriety of the change.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman also state the amount of appropriation in difference between the two Houses?

Mr. RANDALL. Finally the House conferees submitted to the Senate conferees a proposition as a modification of the second section, which they rejected but took with them to the Senate, and upon that the Senate has asked a further conference, without, so far as I am able to learn, assenting to the proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the Senate appointed new conferees?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; not new conferees; they have re-appointed the conferees originally appointed. I ask the Clerk to read the proposition which the House conferees submitted as a modification of the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sums herein appropriated as the compensation of the officers and employés of the Government respectively enumerated in this act shall be in full for all compensation of such officers or employés for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, unless Congress shall otherwise provide in the manner hereinafter authorized.

Section 3——

Mr. RANDALL. Before the Clerk reads further, I wish to say that the section just read recognizes the right of the House to fix the compensation for the coming fiscal year. We claim the right; and I suppose the Senate would consent that we should at least control the amount of money that we would appropriate for this purpose during this year.

The second proposition which the Clerk is about to read originated with the Senate conferees, but was accepted as part of the offer of the House conferees to the Senate. The two propositions thus go together as an offer on the part of the House to the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That a joint select committee of four shall be appointed, two by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the requisite number and proper salaries of the officers, clerks, and employés in the several Executive Departments of the Government, with a view to the due and permanent adjustment of the same, having regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service. Said joint committee shall sit during the recess of Congress, and shall make their report thereon to the two Houses on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman from whom this report comes?

Mr. RANDALL. It will be observed that the Senate conferees took that proposition to the Senate, and I believe that in reporting the disagreement the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate communicated the substance of these propositions, or in fact I think those propositions literally. We have not yet heard from the Senate as to whether they will now assent to those propositions or not, although they have appointed a new conference on the part of the Senate and asked for the appointment of a new conference committee on the part of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Now I ask the gentleman from whom this report and these resolutions or bills come?

Mr. RANDALL. I have heretofore stated the facts in reference to these propositions: That the first clause emanated in the spirit of compromise from the House conferees; that the third section covers some offers which were made on the part of the Senate conferees. That was assented to on the part of the House conferees, and the two were presented together as a whole by the House conferees to the Senate conferees, thinking the Senate would assent to that proposition.

Mr. CONGER. Now I understand that these conferees were appointed for a particular purpose by this House, to have a conference on a bill, and I would like to know by what right the House conferees report as House conferees anything except on the matter committed to them.

Mr. RANDALL. I have included those propositions as part of my remarks, with a view to fully inform the House, as far as I am able or allowed, as to what has been done between the two Houses. It is all in the direction of full information.

Mr. GARFIELD. Was any counter-proposition submitted from the other side?

Mr. RANDALL. And the gentlemen from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will remember that I was asked these questions by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on that side of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the House ought to know the condition of the controversy, so that it may act intelligently. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania further, with his permission, whether any counter-proposition came from the conferees on the part of the Senate to the conferees on the part of the House?

Mr. RANDALL. Various propositions from time to time passed between the conferees on the two committees; and even to this proposition there was a change suggested by one of the House conferees. But finally this is the form in which the House conferees presented the question that it might go to the Senate for their consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, will the gentleman please inform the House what is the difference in the amount of appropriation pending between the two Houses? The House wants a certain sum in the bill. The Senate wants another certain sum. What is the total difference? The Senate has amended the bill increasing the total appropriations by some certain sum. What I wish to know is what is that sum?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the figures here, which I will read for the information of the gentleman. They are in a table prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is one of the conferees on the part of the House and can give the figures.

Mr. SPRINGER. The whole amount estimated in this bill by the Departments——

Mr. GARFIELD. O; we do not want that.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman answer the question in his own way.

Mr. CONGER. I object to anything of that kind. I object to making a political discussion on this report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not making any political discussion.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is stating what the estimates of the Department are.

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot limit debate on this report. The gentleman has a right to answer the question in his own way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the floor for an hour, and have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor, and is not be interrupted except by his own consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. The estimates of the Departments for that part of the public service embraced in this bill were $20,826,307, the appropriations made in a similar bill for the fiscal year which expired yesterday were $18,734,225, and the amount appropriated by the bill now in committee of conference is $12,998,851.61, being a reduction below the estimates of the Departments of $7,826,499.39, and a reduction below the expenditures of the last fiscal year, which expired yesterday, of $5,724,417.19.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now what are the Senate's figures?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not have here the exact difference between the Senate's figures and ours.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Ah!

Mr. SPRINGER. But it is this in substance: They have set the salaries back to what they are under existing law, which makes their appropriations substantially what they were during the last fiscal year, so far as salaries are concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman not know that the reduction by the Senate is more than $2,000,000 below the appropriations of last year? Why, then, does the gentleman say that the amount proposed by the Senate is substantially the same as last year?

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate bill, as I understand it, is about $2,000,000 less than the appropriations of last year, while the House bill is $5,700,000 less. Therefore the difference between the two Houses is $3,700,000 or thereabouts.

Mr. SPRINGER. Those are the figures.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me a moment longer. In brief, about $3,000,000 between the two Houses.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nearly four millions.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I see in his published speech here——

Mr. RANDALL. I will give you the exact figures, if you wish.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The legislative bill as it passed the House appropriated $12,998,815.61; the bill as reported by the Senate committee, $16,606,851; and the bill as it passed the Senate appropriates $16,635,338; so that the bill as it passed the Senate was in excess of the bill of the committee by about $3,635,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want the House to see that the very significant and important points of the controversy between the Senate and House hinge upon two questions, so far as this bill is concerned. The first is that the amount of appropriations on which the two Houses differ is about three and a half millions less than those of the corresponding bill of last year and the second is the independent legislation, to which the Senate objects and holds that the House has no right to force upon the other branch of Congress independent legislation which that branch regards as unwise.

I want to say, before leaving the general subject of appropriations, that I have been somewhat surprised by the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, made a few days ago, in reference to the amount of reduction made in the bills already passed, as compared with those of last year. The gentleman has made a statement, which I see quoted in another place, that the reductions below the estimates this year are $64,000,000, and below the appropriations of last year $39,500,000. The statement of the reduction below the estimates is a misleading one. All through the press of the country the impression is that there has been a cutting down of $64,000,000. Everybody knows that that sort of cutting down from the estimates is done every year to a great extent. The Book of Estimates is not a recommendation of the actual amounts necessary, but a statement of what amounts can be applied to public objects if Congress go to the fullest extent of the work. The Secretary of the Treasury officially and urgently requested a large reduction from the amount of the estimates. The real question is how much the appropriations have been cut down below those of last year. It was stated in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as $39,500,000. I have no doubt that the statement of the gentleman is incorrect to the extent of almost $10,000,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will when I have stated the point. In the first place the gentleman said in his speech that the House has appropriated as deficiencies for the year which has just closed $671,486.74, as against $4,703,000 for deficiencies made last winter, and claims a credit for the House on that account of over $4,000,000. Now, I hold in my hand the digest of appropriations, an official statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the appropriations made by Congress last winter; and I read from page 151 that the total appropriations made at the last session of Congress for the deficiencies for the last fiscal year were $2,387,000, being less than the statement of the gentleman by almost two and one-half millions of dollars in that single item.

Now, the gentleman should tell us where he found his figures. I presume he took them from the report of the Clerk of the House, which included all appropriations of unexpended balances. If he takes them into the account, he should compare them with the five or six millions of re-appropriations which have been made in the bills of this winter. But I have read from the official Treasury analysis of all the deficiency appropriations passed at the last session of Congress amounting to $2,387,370.38. The gentleman seems to forget that the deficiency bill we have passed this session was the deficiency for the year just now closed, and is no part of the appropriations for the coming year which begins to-day. When the next session comes and the House will be called upon to make up the deficiencies for the year which begins this morning, then it will be the time to determine what this Congress has been doing in regard to deficiencies.

The deficiency bill which the House passed this winter was a deficiency of the last Congress; and by whatever amount it was below the deficiencies of the last year the difference is to be set down to the credit of the last Congress in fully making its appropriations so carefully as to require but $600,000 for all deficiencies. When next winter comes and the bills we are now passing will show that by the test of actual experiment what deficiency appropriations will be needed to make up for the undue reductions of this session. After the elections are over and after the fitful fever of these unreasonable reductions has expended itself it will be time to make the comparison and time to send out to the country the story of $64,000,000 or $39,000,000 reduction in the interest of economy.

Many necessary items of appropriation have been wholly omitted from these bills, such for example as $1,000,000 to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims, which cannot be left unprovided for without a shameless violation of the public faith.

Now I want to repeat what I said in the first monthly session, that a democratic House could make some reductions that a republican House could not make. There is no doubt that an opposition House can make some reductions that an administration House could not make, and I am glad to aid this democratic House in all those reasonable reductions which the Government can stand without crippling the public service. But when the gentleman tells me that we can now cut down $39,000,000 after we have already cut down expenses more than $30,000,000 in the past three years, he is only saying that we are going to do one of two things, either cripple the necessary service of the Government or defer the necessary appropriations until next winter, for the sake of a pretense of unreal economy before the people at the coming election. This is not honorable dealing. This is not good statesmanship, nor will it deceive any intelligent citizen.

Now, I believe that we ought to reduce the appropriations from last winter between $15,000,000 and $18,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Why did you not do it last year?

Mr. GARFIELD. We did reduce them $9,000,000 last year and we have reduced them over $30,000,000 in the last three years. As we recede further and further from the war, we can continue to make more reductions until we reach the level of peace expenditures, when in any prosperous and growing country the annual appropriations ought steadily to increase with the growth of the country. We have been steadily reducing the expenditures since 1866 with the exception of two years in which there was a slight reaction. In 1865 the expenditures were $1,297,000,000, and in 1866 $520,000,000. Since then the scale of expenditures has been rapidly descending toward the level of peace. The fiscal year that closed yesterday brought all the expenses of the Government down to $263,000,000, nearly $30,000,000 less than the total expenditures of three years ago, and $257,000,000 less than the expenditures of 1866.

The older members of this House without distinction of party will bear witness that for several years past the House has made an earnest and successful struggle to get down to the normal level of peace; and I cordially join with this House in its efforts to continue the work still further. I repeat what I said early in the session, that I think this House ought to cut down expenses of the coming year from $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 below those of the last year. But after four years' careful study of this work, I am perfectly confident that if we undertake to cut them down $39,000,000 below last year's appropriations we shall cripple the machinery and seriously harm the great and necessary functions of the General Government.

Now I hope that the House will insist on what will amount in the aggregate to reductions of from $15,000,000 to $18,000,000; and I equally hope that the Senate will insist on two things: first, that it will not allow any necessary functions of the Government to be crippled and, second, that it will not allow independent legislation in the wisdom of which it does not concur to be put upon these bills, whereby an appropriation bill is converted into a pack-horse to carry through legislation which otherwise would not pass. Sir, it is bad legislation; it is a bad precedent, a precedent that, even though it should work good in one case, will work evil in a thousand things hereafter.

Now, I do not say there should never be legislation on the appropriation bills. It is frequently possible for the Committee on Appropriations to protect the Treasury and prevent extravagance by restrictive provisions which are germane to the appropriation bills. But one House of Congress has no right to insist upon such riders to the appropriation bills if the other House objects. In all contests it has been the uniform rule that the House which makes the innovation must give way. Now, I understand that the Senate insists that the House shall not make the innovations it has proposed on this bill, and in that point the Senate is clearly right. Wherever the amount of an appropriation is a matter of discretion with Congress, that discretion is a fair subject of compromise between the two Houses, and in such cases I shall stand by this House in having its rights fully respected and its demand for reduction complied with to a just and reasonable extent.

In the matter of demanding a considerable reduction in all the discretionary appropriations, the country will approve the attitude of the House. But, in the position which the House has taken, which arrogates the legislation of Congress to itself, and insists upon the dangerous, the pernicious practice of loading down the appropriation bills with independent legislation, the House is wholly in the wrong, and cannot stand in the estimation of the country. And I see by the results of the conferences that the House has not tested the sense of the Senate upon the amount to be appropriated, but upon the independent legislation, wherein we are wrong. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for his courtesy.

Mr. RANDALL. I resume the floor.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. Not now. As to the amount of appropriation, at the proper time I will review in the proper manner the action of this House in connection with the appropriation bills, and the fact will be established that the Committee on Appropriations recommended to this House reductions of more than $39,000,000 as compared with the appropriation of the last year, that the House has adopted those recommendations in the main except in one about the post-office bill, and that the amount of reduction upon the appropriations of this year is about $37,000,000. Now it is fair enough, as I think, but not as fair as if the gentleman and I were to sit down without any partisan feeling and act upon the merits of each appropriation, and I think in that case we would cut down the appropriations $10,000,000 more, and I do not think it becomes the gentleman, the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House, to stand up and tell the Senate not to yield one iota where any legislation is to be incorporated in the bill. In former years the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations allowed legislation to be incorporated in the interest of extravagance and in the increase of appropriation, while we have only altered the rule so as to admit legislation being incorporated into an appropriation bill having the object and the sole object of reducing the expenditures of the Government. I am glad to hear the gentleman admit that some good can come out of an opposition House, and if we had had an opposition Senate we should have had no difficulty whatever in administering the Government properly on a reduction of from forty to fifty million dollars; and I claim that in no respect whatever will there be claimed or has been claimed that the administration of the Government has been injured by the appropriations made by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me one practical question while the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Ohio have been scolding each other considerable——

Mr. RANDALL. I was not scolding anybody. I was merely stating the history of the appropriations.

Mr. HALE. As I understand it, there is now a difference between the Senate and House in conference committees of about $3,000,000 in the whole bill and certain differences arising on the part of the House reducing salaries.

Mr. RANDALL. Not exclusively reducing amounts.

Mr. HALE. What I want to add to my question is, how much money is involved in this difference between the Senate and the House? It arises from the attempt on the part of the House to cut down the salaries by changing the present law, and my reason for asking the question is this: There is clearly a difference between the House insisting and determining to insist on driving the Senate into a change of law upon which a reduction of appropriation will result, and on the other hand insisting on a reduction of the discretionary appropriations. My view on these two questions is this, that when we attempt to change the law, then our co-ordinate branch, the Senate, which is of course a co-ordinate branch in all cases but especially in conference committees, have as much right as we have. We cannot say to them that we as Representatives can change the law and drive you to yield. The Senate has better ground there for resisting and claiming to be on an equality with us. I would like to know how much money is involved in these disagreements arising out of changes of law. When we come to the discretionary appropriations, where no law is changed, the House of Representatives—and I hold that the people will sustain it in that—has a superior right to the Senate, although it is not the bounden duty of the Senate to yield to unreasonable demands, but to consider the position which the House holds as the Representatives of the people. I have no doubt, from two or three days of experience on committees of conference, that on these discretionary appropriations the Senate realizes the position and will fairly yield, so that we can pass the appropriation bills and go home. But if on the top of that we insist on changing the laws and embodying legislation on appropriation bills and in coercing the Senate in the adoption of that legislation, then I say that the Senate, being in the right, can afford to stand to its position, as it cannot do in the matter of discretionary laws.

I have no doubt this distinction has struck the mind of my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the conferences he has asked; perhaps not with the force it strikes me, for to me it is the key to what otherwise might be a dead lock. On the discretionary appropriations—and I will say to my friend that nearly all the credit that he or his party will get for reduction of expenditures will be upon the discretionary appropriations—the Senate will largely yield. But where we of this House seek to force the Senate to consent to a change of law upon an appropriation bill, they will have the advantage of us in insisting upon equal opportunity of conference and judgment in regard to such change of law.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] yield to me?

Mr. McCRARY. I believe the gentleman has consented to yield to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY.] I would ask him how much time he needs.

Mr. McCRARY. I can probably get through in five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly important that this House should understand the grounds upon which we can afford to place ourselves if there is to be any conflict between the two Houses. Let us calmly consider in advance what we may of right demand and what we must of right concede to the other branches of this Government. I am justified by the history of congressional legislation in saying this, that neither House can stand upon a position involving the necessity of insisting upon a change of law in an appropriation bill against the wishes of the other House. Such a demand by one House upon the other never has been successfully made. Neither House has ever been required to yield to the other and permit legislation obnoxious to it to be forced upon an appropriation bill. Either House has the right to say that an appropriation bill shall be such, pure and simple. I do not say that there never has been legislation ingrafted upon an appropriation bill, because that has frequently been done. But when one House proposes to ingraft upon an appropriation bill a legislative provision changing the law, and the other House objects, there is not a case on record in which the House that has proposed the legislation has not been compelled to recede. It is only when both Houses desire it that this unusual and extraordinary, not to say vicious, mode of legislation is tolerated.

The House will remember the history of the dead lock in 1856, when a republican House undertook to ingraft upon the Army appropriation bill a legislative provision to which a democratic Senate objected. It will be remembered that that dead lock continued for several months, and Congress did not adjourn until near the 1st of October. It adjourned finally after the House receded from its position and agreed not to insist upon the proposed legislation in the Army appropriation bill.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a speech upon that subject made by a democratic Senator in the course of the discussions of that year, in which the doctrine that I have laid down here now was so clearly, so strongly stated that I can express my own views in no other way so well as by adopting his language. I allude to the remarks of Senator R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, a leading member of the Senate at that time and famous as the great parliamentarian in the United States Senate. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked in the Congressional Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, sir, what I said was, when either House sought to make the appropriation bills the means of forcing on another a measure which was obnoxious to it, in either alternative it was revolution itself; that is to say, a change of Constitution; for it forced the other House to yield its constitutional privileges in order to get the Government along. It would be revolutionary if they failed to be coerced in this way and stopped the wheels of the Government to compel them to do it; because it is their constitutional duty to carry on this Government and respect the constitutional privileges of the other branch. I know votes can be brought up in which I have voted for legislative measures on the appropriation bills. I have always believed that it was irregular, that it was improper; but I have never advocated the doctrine of voting for it in one House when known to be obnoxious to the other. But even in regard to the tariff amendment of last year, it will be found by referring to the debate that I admitted then that if it was obnoxious to either House the other had no right to insist; and consequently when the Senate out of abundant caution struck it out, against my vote I admit, but struck it out in reference to some such contingency as this, the House acceded to it, and admitted the propriety of doing so. I only urged it upon the ground that it was agreeable to the House, where it passed almost without reference to party. If it were agreeable to the Senate too, and agreeable to all sides, I should not say there was anything revolutionary or improper in the act. But what is revolutionary, and what is improper, in my estimation, is for one House to attempt to use appropriation bills to force on the other legislation which is obnoxious to it, to make it give up its will, its views of propriety, its feelings of what is right. The distinction is obvious. I have never said that the mere act of sending this provision here, if agreeable to us, would be revolutionary in itself; but I say that if, after we have shown our dissent to it, and declared that it is not agreeable to us, they should insist on it, and say we must either take it or they will stop the wheels of Government, the act would be revolutionary in itself, because it is saying to us that we must give up those privileges which belong to us.

We have a right to judge in regard to this measure; and if they say we shall not judge, but must adopt their opinions or they will stop the wheels of Government, I ask if the propriety of such a proceeding can be vindicated? There is only one way in which it seems to me it may be vindicated, and that is that the measure itself is of so much importance that it is justifiable to commit an act of revolution in order to carry it.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the argument which has just been read might have some binding effect upon me, but can hardly have any upon the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] in opposition to the declarations on the same subject of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, then of the House, now Senator SHERMAN, of Ohio.

Mr. McCRARY. It ought to have additional effect, because it is correct. I have quoted it for the special benefit of the other side of the House, and I commend it to the serious consideration of the Committee on Appropriations. If it has some binding effect upon the honorable chairman, I shall be very glad that I was the means of bringing it to his attention. If Senator SHERMAN, then a member of the House, expressed a different view, it is enough for me to say that the view of Senator Hunter prevailed and became a settled and well-established law of congressional action. The House at that day, now twenty years ago, yielded to the doctrine as announced by the Virginia democratic Senator, and from that day to this no other or different rule has ever been insisted upon by either House.

But, sir, I go further. I assert without fear of contradiction that Senator Hunter was right when he asserted that a demand by one House upon the other to submit to the passage of laws in the propriety of which it does not believe, as a condition-precedent to the appropriation of money to keep in motion the wheels of Government, is revolutionary. Let me see if I cannot make this entirely clear by a very brief discussion of the subject. Such a demand, if persisted in, is revolutionary because it is an assertion of the doctrine that the Government shall stop unless the views of one branch of Congress are accepted by the other branch and by the Executive. What is this but the assumption of an unconstitutional and revolutionary power in one House of Congress? What is it but the assertion of a right in one branch of Congress to dictate to and control the action of the other branches of the Government? What is it but a blow at the independence of the two Houses and of the Executive, an independence conferred by the express terms of the Constitution and vital to the well-being, yea, to the very existence of the Government itself?

It is said that the House has the exclusive right to originate appropriation bills. I know the House has claimed this, and perhaps it may be said that the Senate has acquiesced. But the only clause of the Constitution upon which such a claim can be based is that one which declares that—

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

I confess that I have never understood the logic by which it is claimed that an appropriation bill is a bill "to raise revenue." It would seem to me to be exactly the reverse of that—not a bill "to raise revenue," but a bill to expend revenue after it is raised. It is this most unnatural and forced construction of the Constitution which gives the House the exclusive right to originate appropriation bills, but I will not stop here to quarrel with this construction. For the purposes of my argument I adopt it. I assume that an appropriation bill is a revenue bill, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution above quoted, and what follows? It follows that the Senate "may concur with amendments, as on other bills," for the self-same clause of the Constitution so expressly provides. It is therefore self-evident that the Senate has the same right to amend such a bill that the House has to pass it. By what right, then, can the House say to the Senate: "If you exercise your constitutional right of amendment by striking out certain new legislation which we have inserted, and do not recede from your action, the wheels of this Government shall stop!" Is it any wonder that your great democratic Senator pronounced such a doctrine revolutionary and in violation of the Constitution? Is it any wonder that such a demand has never been made with success in the American Congress?

THE NEW RULE.

The majority of this House have undertaken to ingraft sweeping and radical changes of our laws upon the various appropriation bills. Anxious to make a showing of economy, at least until after the presidential election, they began this long session by amending the one hundred and twentieth rule of the House so as to allow any legislation in an appropriation bill which being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditure. Under this rule it was easy enough to strike down appropriations regardless of the law and regardless of justice.

It is not my purpose now to discuss the question what reductions of force or of salaries can be safely made. The subject needs careful consideration. More than one committee needs to be consulted about it. Some Bureaus have not force enough and are falling behind with their work, to the great inconvenience of the public service. This is notably true of the Pension Bureau and the Land Office. The business of the Post-Office Department is necessarily increasing with the extension of settlements, the building of new railroads, and the like. But it was impossible for the Committee on Appropriations in addition to their other important duties to make themselves familiar with the facts and the wants of all the various branches of the service, and they therefore struck blindly at the whole public service, foreign and domestic. Want of information prevented intelligent action; but a large saving must be reported for political purposes, and hence we have a sweeping uniform reduction of pay and numbers. Such was the inevitable result of the agreement made by the majority at the opening of the session to put their important measures all upon appropriation bills, and the great powers of the House all into the hands of the Committee on Appropriations.

We have seen, as a result, the able and experienced Committee on Foreign Affairs sitting quietly and idly in their places while the Appropriation Committee made havoc of our poorly paid but vastly important consular and diplomatic service. We have seen in like manner the great committees of the House, representing the Army, the Navy, the Post-Office, the Pension, Land, and Indian Offices, all shorn of their proper jurisdiction and their powers under the amended rule assumed by the Committee on Appropriations. And we have heard this latter committee when pressed for an explanation of the reasons for their action repeat over and over that they had determined upon a uniform reduction of 20 per cent. of force and 10 per cent. of pay, but why this is deemed safe and expedient they could not tell. I assert that this attempt to make a general indiscriminate sweeping reduction without consideration is purely for political and partisan ends.

The fact that some of the leaders on the other side most prominent in the movement were equally prominent and active a little while ago in the effort to increase salaries and secure back pay is proof enough of this. But the history of Rule 120 affords further illustration of the same thing. This rule as originally adopted in 1837 was as follows:

> No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

In 1838 the following words were added:

> Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government.

The rule had been for many years construed as forbidding an amendment to a general appropriation bill changing in any way existing law. I refer to Barclay's Digest, page 16.

But the democratic party being in power in 1850 and desiring to increase the pay of democratic officials, the then democratic Speaker of this House decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose. I refer again to same authority. The history of the rule, therefore, is simply this: When democrats held the offices the democratic party so changed the rule as to allow an increase of salaries; when the time came that the House was democratic and the other branches of Government republican, the same democratic party changed the rule again so as to allow salaries to be reduced. Such is democratic consistency. When that party enjoyed the patronage of the Executive, it was deemed important to allow an increase but not a decrease of salaries by legislative provision in an appropriation bill, but a democratic House takes precisely the opposite view when their political opponents are in office. The insincerity of the majority may be further illustrated by a reference to well-known facts. A large proportion of the salaries now proposed to be reduced were fixed by the democratic party prior to 1860, when salaries were paid in gold and when the cost of living in Washington was at least one-third less than it is to-day. The salaries, therefore, which the democratic party fixed for democratic officials to be paid in gold in a time of cheap living are held by that party to be too much to be paid in greenbacks to republican officials in time of expensive living.

I am not insisting that no salaries should be reduced. I am insisting that the subject of re-adjusting salaries should be considered by the proper committees and should be reported upon in a separate bill, and take the usual course of all other legislation. But the amendment of Rule 120 has a much broader scope. It reaches far beyond the question of salaries. If insisted upon—if the House is to insist that the other branch of Congress shall admit into appropriation bills whatever the House inserts under its own construction of this rule—then it is capable of producing much greater mischief than has generally been supposed. The House may under this new rule insert any new legislation that will tend to reduce expenditures. Is everything that stops an appropriation therefore good? By no means. The appropriations for the time being might be reduced by abolishing the Federal judiciary; or by cutting down the Supreme Court to three judges; or by calling home all our foreign representatives; or by crippling the Pension Office and thus cheating unfortunate pensioners; or by reducing facilities for carrying the mails; or by repealing all laws for the protection of the citizen; or by stopping supplies for the Indians; or by mustering out the gallant officers of our Army; or by consolidating under one head all the Bureaus of the several Departments.

It is easy to see that legislation may be destructive of the interests of the people and in the interest of injustice and wrong, and may still retrench expenses. Since good government costs money; it is evident that by sacrificing good government in any given direction you may keep money in the Treasury which would otherwise go out. And the operation of this new rule has been such as to clearly prove that it is capable of great mischief, entirely aside from the salary question. Some of the matters now in dispute between the two Houses will illustrate this. For example, the House has, against the united protest of this side, ingrafted upon the sundry civil appropriation bill the following proviso:

> Provided, That all of the provisions of title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the registration of voters and the appointment of supervisors of elections, and deputy and special deputy marshals, and touching the supervision of elections, are hereby repealed.

Sir, what is this statute which this House would repeal on the eve of a presidential election? It is no more nor less than a simple, fair, and just provision for the appointment, upon the petition of citizens in any city of over twenty thousand inhabitants, of two supervisors, "who shall be of different political parties" and residents and voters of the precinct where they serve. These supervisors are authorized to be present and scrutinize the proceedings at an election or registration and to make a record thereof. They are simply witnesses who have a right to see what is going on, and who will be likely to know of the perpetration of any frauds. The law is framed upon the theory that crimes are not apt to be perpetrated in the presence of witnesses. These supervisors have no power to interfere with the elections or to order or direct anything. To prevent partialty, they are taken from both parties and to secure perfect fairness in their selection their appointment is given to the United States circuit court. If impartiality can be found anywhere, it will be found in the Federal judiciary. The law also provides for the appointment in such cities of deputy marshals, to aid and assist the supervisors and to keep the peace and preserve order. All these provisions apply solely to elections at which members of Congress or presidential electors are to be chosen. Why should this law be repealed? Why should a provision for its repeal be thrust into an appropriation bill and a threat held out that, unless the Senate and the President will consent to the repeal, the wheels of Government shall stop? Is there any city in the Union containing over twenty thousand inhabitants in which the majority of this House object to having the election scrutinized by one republican and one democratic supervisor of elections, to be appointed by a circuit judge? Is the repeal intended to make frandulent voting and ballot-box-stuffing easy and safe in any great city, and thereby to make democratic success more probable? And will the House ask a republican Senate to consent to this as the only terms upon which the House will pass the appropriation bill at all?

Again, the House has ingrafted upon the Indian appropriation bill a provision to transfer the care, education, and control of the Indians to the War Department. Many of the ablest and best men of this country denounce this as inhuman, unchristian, and extravagant. Inhuman and unchristian, because no class of our people, however poor, neglected, or savage, should be given over to the cruelties and the crushing, demoralizing, and hardening influences of Army rule and bayonet government. Extravagant, because even the savage knows enough of liberty and cares enough for it to rebel against Army control; and the proposed change must therefore lead to Indian wars, the cost of which the country knows to its sorrow. Shall the House insist that unless the Senate will agree to this no appropriation shall be made for the Indian service? If so, what becomes of free discussion as to matters of legislation? What becomes of the independence of the several branches of our Government? What would the House say to the Senate if, under its undoubted power of amendment, it should insert a provision as obnoxious to the House as these provisions are to the Senate, and thereupon insist that the House must agree with the Senate or no appropriation shall be made? I can imagine in such a case how great would be the indignation of this House, and how eloquently it would be expressed by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

KEY TO THE DEAD LOCK.

The House must not stand upon the doctrine that we can insist upon new legislation obnoxious to the Senate in an appropriation bill. In so far as the Senate can be induced to agree to legislative provisions in such bills, well and good, but when the Senate says to us that they cannot approve of or consent to any particular legislative provision, it is the duty of the House to recede. The rule laid down by Senator Hunter in 1856 will always bring the Houses together. That rule, as stated by him, is that neither House shall "use appropriation bills to force on the other legislation which is obnoxious to it, to make it give up its will, its views of propriety, its feelings of what is right."

I beg the House to consider how important this rule is; how necessary to the very existence of the Government itself. If it does not prevail, then it follows inevitably that a majority of one House can destroy the freedom and independence of the other branches of government or compel them to maintain it only at the cost of stopping the wheels of Government. This is not simply a question of salaries; it involves vastly more than the legislation immediately pending. It involves a question which may at some time touch the vitals of the Constitution itself, for if the right now claimed for the House is once recognized and should be followed in the future it must bring on conflicts between the two branches of Congress the end of which no man can foretell.

In conclusion, I submit to the House that much more can be accomplished in the line of genuine reform by adhering to correct principles of legislation than by departing from them. So general is the apprehension that it is a dangerous practice to crowd legislation on various subjects into one bill that in many of the States there are constitutional requirements that no bill shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be embraced in its title. If I believed that the legislation proposed by the House upon these appropriation bills was all right and in the direction of reform, I should still insist that it was an unwise thing to ingraft it upon those bills. After spending many months in maturing these changes of law, the House, in the last days of the session, when the heat of the summer is upon us, sends these bills to the Senate. That body cannot have the time nor the opportunity to consider them. It is most natural for them to say, "We will appropriate according to law, but we cannot now undertake to consider all these sweeping and important changes in the law." The House has taken the very course best calculated to defeat the object it professes to have in view. We have been in session now nearly eight months. Why were no bills matured and passed and sent to the Senate early in the session proposing these changes. If they are desirable changes it was the duty of the House to propose them in the usual way; but the House in its wisdom has seen fit to attempt by a change of its rules to give control over nearly all important changes of law to the Committee on Appropriations and to attempt to ingraft all its important legislation upon the appropriation bills. The result is what might have been expected and what was indeed predicted on this side of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The particular point is that the doctrine of Mr. SHERMAN was overruled and this principle was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. And as an effect you continued all your extravagant laws in appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. The debate has wandered a little too far from this bill to serve to enlighten the House on the real question before us. I beg to recall the attention of gentlemen to this particular bill. What is it? It is the bill which provides for the numbers and the rate of compensation of the civil officers and employés who are necessary to carry on the Government for the ensuing fiscal year. It embraces the officers and employés in each of the Executive Departments, in the mints of the United States, and in the various Departments, embracing what we call the civil service. During the last year, after the reductions then made, there were something over four thousand of these various persons, from the President down. This bill, as reported in the House, reduced the number of these civil officers, embracing the persons employed in the mints and other places of like kind throughout the country, by over 22 per cent.; that is to say, the House bill proposed at one blow to strike down nearly one quarter of the civil service of the United States. The statement of the proposition is enough, I think, to show to every member of the House that it involved great danger to the safety and efficiency of your administration. Nearly one-fourth of the force of the various Departments swept out of office without a day's notice, for to-day is the first day of the new fiscal year.

That I may illustrate the danger, let me say that in the Adjutant-General's Office, if the House bill takes effect, you would close up three divisions of labor, divisions which have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars every year by their investigations into claims more or less fraudulent, presented to the Court of Claims and to the Committee of War Claims of this House. You would close up this and like divisions in other Departments of the Government if the House bill took effect. I could speak of other Departments, but I do not wish to take up time. Now, the House sent such a bill to the Senate, proposing that only $13,392,000 in round numbers be appropriated for carrying on all these branches of the public service, involving this reduction of numbers and also the reduction of salaries. This bill also embraces congressional pay and the compensation of all the employés connected with Congress, the officers and employés of the Government Printing Office, &c. Thus you find that a large part of the reduction of expense is in this extraordinary diminution of numbers and a less part, I think, in the reduction of salaries.

The original bill which we passed last year for these same purposes appropriated $19,131,000, in round numbers. The pending House bill appropriates, as I have said, $13,392,000, in round numbers. As amended by the Senate, it appropriates $17,028,000, in round numbers. That is to say, the House proposes a reduction of $5,700,000 upon the bill of last year and the Senate a reduction of $2,102,000, the reductions of the Senate being effected chiefly by the reduction of force heretofore authorized by law.

Then, too, the House bill left out items amounting to $375,000, some of which were for rents of buildings which we must have and which we are constantly using; others making provision for clerks, &c., in the surveyors-generals' offices, that must be provided for. So that the actual difference between the two Houses is in the neighborhood of $3,000,000.

Now, then, the question is, have we a right to compel the Senate to adopt the changes proposed by us in the law regulating these Departments and prescribing the respective numbers and pay, in order to enforce this enormous reduction of nearly one-fourth of the entire civil service? In other words, has the Senate itself no constitutional authority touching the number and classification of the officers and clerks by whom the Government of the United States shall be carried on? Is it simply an office to register the decrees of the House?

[Here the hammer fell.]

I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, having yielded so much to others, will not cut off a member of the conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I yielded to one member only on this side.

Mr. KASSON. But the other two members of the committee of conference have spoken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. Let unanimous consent be given that the gentleman from Pennsylvania retain the floor if that is what he desires. I only wish to finish my statement of the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Iowa will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir, when it came to that, the Senate refused to evacuate its constitutional position as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, endowed no less than ourselves with the law-making power. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said to you that the first section which he had read as proposed by the House conferees was an assertion of the right of the House to fix salaries. The Senate denies the exclusive claim of the House, and says that itself has a share in that constitutional right, and must co-operate with the House and the President of the United States in order to establish rules governing numbers employed and their salaries; and it refuses to relinquish that constitutional right of free assent or dissent in respect to new laws.

As one Representative of this House, I take the position, and I desire it to be understood, that the right of the Senate is clear and palpable under our Constitution. It is one of the people's defenses against haste, passion, and breaches of the Constitution by a single House. The conferees on the part of the House have never within my knowledge demanded in conference that the Senate should repudiate that right, to co-operate in the making of law and to give full and free assent or refuse assent to a change in the law. Whatever gentlemen may claim on this floor for political purposes, that right is not claimed, so far as I know, in the committee-room. On the other hand it is equally true that the Senate has not refused to change laws in the interest of economy. It has only refused to do it where the judgment of that House condemned the change as injurious to the service. It has conceded in these reductions of over $2,000,000, in the interest of economy, such changes of law as were requisite to make those reductions. It might go further still, if the House would meet them in the spirit of moderation and justice, and not as dictators, without conciliation or concession.

Let us not, therefore, mistake the positions of the House and Senate respectively on this question. I desire to have it distinctly understood, that it is not only the wish of republicans in both Houses to go to the extreme of economy possible consistent with the efficiency of the service, but gentlemen must see it is the interest, also, of this side of the House equally, and particularly at this time, to go to the last degree of economy that does not destroy our public service. Now the question, of course, comes back whether the House goes further in the direction of destroying the service than it ought to do. And on that, sir, where shall we look for conclusive authority for the facts?

When an officer at the head of a Bureau, or at the head of a Department, points out to the House or the Senate the amount of work to be done, and with his long experience tells you that so many clerks have hardly been able hitherto to keep up the work, and that if you reduce the number by one-quarter it will fall enormously in arrear, is such an assurance to go for nothing with the House and the Senate?

The head of the Pension Office told me only this morning that there were 17,000 more claims pending this year in that office than last year. When you strike down his force you deny to the claimants of pensions from this Government the ability to reach the determination of their claims and the consequent relief of their most pressing wants. Or take the Adjutant-General's Office, to which I have already referred. Or take the Treasurer's Office. The Treasurer to-day is out of office. When he communicated to me the facts about his Office he had no earthly interest in the subject except the interest of a patriotic and accomplished officer; and he says that the Senate proposition for his Office embraces not a single man or clerk that can be spared, if the efficiency of that branch of the service is to be maintained or the necessary work performed.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman know that there is not a single department of this Government that lives up to the law as to the hours of labor, the hours of employment, which the law provides shall be eight during six months and ten during the other six months? Does not the gentleman know that in no department of the Government with some few exceptions is more than seven hours' work performed?

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, I know of some cases, of officers and clerks, who go back after dinner and work until nearly midnight.

Mr. RANDALL. Those cases are very few.

Mr. KASSON. And I know that the number of hours they are employed depends on two things: the physical ability of the employé and the immediate condition of the public business in the several Bureaus.

Mr. RANDALL. If you watch the Departments, you will see the numbers who rush in at nine and rush out at four, and never go back.

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever benefit there is in law already exists in law. And I know that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will sit down and examine accounts and compute figures, or count bank bills for eight hours a day, and do it for three days in succession, he will go home a wiser (if not a better) man touching the ability of such clerks to work ten hours steadily day after day.

Mr. RANDALL. I work every day in my life more than that.

Mr. KASSON. I do not wish to be drawn from the main question here. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not work at one desk and one kind of work that long. This, then, is the position of the two Houses: This House, or rather a committee of this House, think they can arbitrarily reduce the force engaged in the public service nearly one-quarter in a single year, nay, in a single day, without notice. The Senate say, after consulting with the executive officers of the Government, it cannot be done without detriment to the public service, and a large portion of this House agrees in that opinion. The Senate yields three or four hundred in the matter of reduction of numbers and is willing to go further. Under these circumstances what does the Senate propose? They say in effect: "Perhaps we are mistaken; perhaps you are mistaken as to the requisite number. What shall we do? Let the House salary appropriations stand; and we will appoint a committee of the two Houses who shall sit in the coming vacation; and that committee shall examine into all these Executive Departments and their needs, with ample time during the vacation, and shall report the first day of the next session as to what the number and compensation should be; and thereupon Congress shall adjust the salaries and the numbers as they should be." And the Senate further says: "In order that we may do no injustice in rates of compensation in the coming fiscal year and before the next session, that recommendation shall operate upon this fiscal year from the 1st of July. The House conferees declined to do that. And that is the present form of the difference. It is not so much in regard to the question of the permanent fixing of the salaries as it is in respect to an absolute and compulsory change of the law in this inconsiderate and reckless way for this fiscal year.

For myself, I can only say that I think the proposition on the part of the Senate, for the careful examination by a joint committee of the whole subject, so that our legislation at the next session may operate on the whole fiscal year, is, in view of the short time we have now for considering the important questions involved, a just and fair proposition. On the other question, the question of principle, I agree mainly with the observations which have been made by two or three gentlemen on this side. We ought not, cannot, must not, ask the Senate to vacate its constitutional function, as an absolutely equal and coordinate branch of the legislative power, nor deny its right to give a full and free assent or dissent to a change of the laws of the land. To deny their rights in this is to subvert so much of the Constitution. It is, so far as it goes, an attempted revolution.

A word further upon the point which has been discussed of the alleged reduction by this House of expenditures as compared with the estimates. If mere reduction of expenditures is meritorious, then the democratic majority might claim the highest possible merit by abolishing the entire Army and Navy, discontinuing the Federal courts, closing out and locking up the Executive Departments, refusing appropriations for pensions, and dissolving this expensive machinery of Senate and House of Representatives. That would be "retrenchment" in their use of the word. They have in fact proposed many millions of their reductions in this way, by abolishing a part of the Army, impairing the efficiency of the Navy, abolishing the Indian Bureau, depriving the Departments of means to do the work imposed on them by law, weakening the mail service by cutting off supplies for the service, refusing money to finish improvements in our western navigation, and denying to the laborers on unfinished public buildings the employment they need, at the very time they would willingly give their work at low prices for the sake of support for their families. They call it "reducing expenses of Government," when they only postpone to deficiency bills the absolutely needed supplies, or postpone inevitable work from this year to the next. They leave out of their footings of appropriations the millions they have re-appropriated without giving the amounts. They make their comparison with the formal "estimates" of last year, when they know the actual sums appropriated were less by nearly $20,000,000. They know perfectly well that judgments against the United States in the Court of Claims must be paid and that a large amount of these are now awaiting payment, and that the "estimate" for this fiscal year for that purpose was $2,000,000. Yet, in order to boast of their "reductions," they have repudiated these adjudicated debts, and have not appropriated one dollar for them. Any party willing to dishonor the nation could "retrench" magnificently by such repudiation.

Sir, I regret that I have not had time to go throughout the bills and show how their alleged "reductions" have been made. Time has only been found to illustrate under the head of public works how "reductions" for this year mean simply postponements to next year.

The following table shows the "estimates" for works mainly in progress, and which must be completed, and where "reductions" mean postponement:

Here, then, without going into the subject of the re-appropriations in the House bills, of the economies of a republican administration, amounting to a total of millions, which they refused to add to their footings lest they should so appear and lessen their "reductions," as they in fact do—here in this table alone we have about $21,000,000 of alleged "reductions" which are chiefly mere postponements of appropriations to deficiency bills for this year or appropriation bills for next year; and this is called "retrenchment" or "economy," and is to last till after election.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio that the estimates or statements contained in the table I submitted to the House a few days ago are not correct, I have only this to state: That the figures in the first column of this estimate were compiled by the Departments themselves, and show the estimates of the Departments. The second column, being the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1876, the fiscal year just expired, was compiled by Mr. McPherson, the late Clerk of this House. For those I am not responsible, nor is the Appropriations Committee, nor is the clerk of the Appropriations Committee. But the other statements here were prepared by the clerk of the Appropriations Committee, and upon them I rest, and this House will rest, and the country will rest, as to the truth of those statements, notwithstanding that they are challenged by the gentleman from Ohio. Upon those statements it will appear that the appropriations as they have now passed the House are $64,392,117.20 below what the heads of the Departments of this Government said they needed for the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. FOSTER. They never said so.

Mr. SPRINGER. They made their estimates of the amount required for the various Departments of the Government; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has stated it was a great wrong upon the public service to reduce the number of clerks because the heads of the Departments said they needed that number.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the gentleman does not want to be unfair.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I do not want to be unfair.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, does the gentleman say that when the War Department says in answer to a resolution of the House that a certain harbor in this country should be surveyed and that it will cost so much to make the improvement—does he say that the Department demands that sum of money? They do not. The simply estimate the cost at the request of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Departments under a general law estimate the cost of administering this Government; and the gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct when he states that we received estimates from the various Departments of the Government, and upon those estimates we have made appropriations nearly $64,000,000 less than the Departments estimate as necessary to run the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I say they do not claim those amounts as necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. You will not put your Departments in the position of asking what is not necessary, will you?

Mr. FOSTER. They simply tell you what the cost of making these improvements are; and what is the cost of completing the public buildings of this country which the Congress orders.

Mr. RANDALL. That is part of your patronage, as well as anything else.

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary of the Treasury told you after these estimates came in that you could cut them down to meet the requirements of the present financial situation. These are not demands on the part of the Departments. They are simply estimates of the cost.

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield further. I have made the statement, and I stand upon it, that these are the estimates which the law requires these Deparments to make to Congress. They submit those estimates as the estimates of the money necessary for the public service, according to their recommendation; and below those recommendations this House has made a reduction of $64,000,000. That is the fact, as it appears on the record.

Now what is the fact on record as to the last fiscal year, the year ending June 30, 1876? This House has passed bills reducing the expenditures for the coming year $39,175,451.10 below the appropriations for the fiscal year which ended yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not true. The gentleman misstates.

Mr. SPRINGER. I state this upon the authority of the estimates made by the Appropriations Committee of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. The chairman of that committee will not bear out the gentleman in that statement.

Mr. RANDALL. The statement is correct. You cannot controvert it.

Mr. FOSTER. I can.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then do it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will do it. I am challenged to controvert that statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you back down. I am challenged to controvert the statement that the reductions are $39,000,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then do so now.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield to the gentleman from Ohio for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do yield to him.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the statement that the reductions in the appropriations of next year—so I understand him to say—are $39,000,000 below the appropriations for the year which has just expired. Am I correct?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; I stated that.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, in that estimate is a reduction of $4,000,000 for deficiencies for the year just expired; and the gentleman makes the statement that this is a reduction of expenditures for the next ensuing year. These are deficiencies that applied to the year that has just passed, and can in no case be a reduction for this year. Then take off your $4,000,000 there.

Now, let me tell the gentleman another thing, that that four millions cannot apply to this year; it can only apply to last year. That reduces the amount of the appropriation to $35,000,000.

Then I think I can show beyond any controversy that this committee has re-appropriated unexpended balances of former appropriations, sums unused in the Treasury, amounting to $5,000,000, which will appear in the next year's expenditures, thus showing an expenditure of $5,000,000 greater than the appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. More than a million of that was to pay deficiencies in the Army.

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir; outside of the Army deficiency.

Then, you have made no appropriation to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims, amounting to six or seven hundred thousand dollars more. Then again, you have made an indefinite appropriation for the mints, which last year amounted to more than a third of a million of dollars. The two latter items amount to more than $1,000,000. I have now shown that these reductions you have made do not exceed $30,000,000, and, I think, a million less than that.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a very good admission; that is a good winter's work.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am glad the gentleman admitted that so much has been done in the way of retrenchment, because the country did not expect so much of this House, and I am sure we did not expect it ourselves. Although the Committee on Appropriations have labored and done well, they could hardly have expected to have accomplished so much. They are willing to have the fact go forth to the country that they have been able to reduce expenditures $30,000,000 over the expenditures of last year; and when the proper time comes the people of the country will not fail to decide that the Committee on Appropriations have done well. If the gentleman from Ohio has not within the borders of his own State a man who can administer the affairs of the country with that amount, we upon this side of the House have a man who resides in the State of New York who knows how to do it and can do it and will do it with that amount of money. [Applause on the floor and hisses in the gallery.] The gentleman from Ohio may be able by his ingenuity to strike out some items as deficiencies or otherwise, yet I assert again that the items appropriated this year by this Congress as compared with those appropriated by the last House of Representatives were as I have stated, and in proof of this assertion I place upon the record the following statement as a portion of my remarks:

Statement of appropriation bills passed by the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress, showing the estimates of the Departments for each bill; the amounts appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1877, by this House; the reductions made in each bill below the estimates, and the reductions made by this House below the amounts appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. KASSON. What is that table?

Mr. RANDALL. I want to bring the House to a vote upon this question, and I resume the floor for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me two or three minutes more?

Mr. RANDALL. You have had two or three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I want merely to make a statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot yield further.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to state what the difference is.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield for two minutes, if you want to take back your statement that we have saved $30,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. A large portion of that is postponement, and not reduction.

Mr. FOSTER. I merely want to call the attention of the House to one matter which I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has not looked into and which probably I have not as carefully examined as I should have done. But I think that it will be found that the difference between the House and the Senate on the question of salaries does not exceed $750,000. I think that the reduction of salaries proposed by the House does not exceed $750,000, and I want to make that statement that the House may know how little the difference is between the two Houses in dollars and cents, and one-half of that is made up in the salaries of members. I do not think the reduction of the salaries of clerks in the Departments exceeds $350,000.

Mr. SEELYE. I want three minutes. I have very little concern about the question whether this party or that party has or has not been in the habit of incorporating new legislation on appropriation bills. But I have great concern in the question whether this House shall approve such pernicious legislation, legislation fraught with untold possibilities of evils that every man of us is familiar with, legislation which does not differ in any respect from the most arbitrary practices of the most tyrannical despotism and which is unworthy of the legislation of a free people.

Now I notice that in all the procedures of these conference committees the first point which they bring up in the conference is this new legislation. They go to the Senate and demand conformity to this new legislation of the House. It is not a question in the first place whether the House and the Senate can agree on certain changes in the abuse of existing statutes, but in the first place the House through its committee have gone and thrust in the face of the Senate this new legislation, I will not say as a highwayman with a pistol in hand saying "Stand and deliver," but I will say with that which is tyrannical and despotic and has no other meaning; I have therefore prepared a resolution which I beg leave to offer to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not yield for the resolution.

Mr. SEELYE. I ask that it be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to having it read.

The Clerk read the proposed resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the committees of conference in the disagreements between the House and Senate on the pending appropriation bills be instructed hereafter to ask an agreement in the first place upon matters which conform to present existing statutes, leaving matters of new legislation for secondary consideration.

Mr. SEELYE. Does the gentleman object to a vote on that resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. O, the gentleman knows all about it.

Mr. SEELYE. I offer that resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANDALL. You have not the power.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. SEELYE. Allow me another inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I gave you what you asked, and that is enough.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me three minutes?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; three minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. We have heard a vast deal on the subject of appropriations during this Congress, and especially within the last four or five weeks. Now, I am willing to concede that both parties in this House are actuated by the best and purest motives of economy and are endeavoring to serve the best interest of the country; and I desire merely to make this suggestion to gentlemen on this floor representing the republican party of this country, and I think it is a wise one for them if, indeed, they are sincere in their efforts. I have listened to all the suggestions made on this side of the House, and especially by our most active and vigilant committee, upon the subject of appropriating money to carry on the Government. We have seen the results of their labors and the country has seen the results of their labors, and the country, being fully informed of what has taken place in this House, will judge between the two parties.

My observation has been that there have been but few propositions by our Committee of Appropriations to reduce the expenditures of the Government that have not been objected to on the other side.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is not quite correct there.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. In almost every instance.

Mr. FOSTER. Not one in fifty.

Mr. RANDALL. The record shows it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The suggestion I would make is this: Let us take charge of the Government in this respect. You have done your duty most fully; we are now at something like a dead lock. If improper legislation has been incorporated in these appropriation bills the fault is ours, and the responsibility will fall upon the democratic party. You have done your duty; now let the appropriations of our committees be adopted. If it is found that the Government is brought to a stop; that its wheels are clogged, or, as said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] this morning, that the doors of its offices will be closed and the operations of the Government must cease, then let the blame fall upon the democratic party; you are acquitted of all responsibility.

Let these appropriation bills go through; make your protest; let the country judge; and if the democratic party has done wrong the people of the country will visit their disapprobation upon that party and the glory will belong to you. But let us make the experiment; you can never reduce the expenses of this Government until you try. Let us try it and then we can judge of the result.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKS. I ask my colleague to yield to me for two or three minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield for three minutes.

Mr. JENKS. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] speaks of the reduction of 22 per cent. in the employés of the Government as being excessive. Let us apply that to the Pension Bureau, where they now ask an increase of a hundred employés. Perhaps that Bureau will furnish as fair an illustration of the propriety of this reduction as any other. Although it is said that the work in that Bureau is behind, that is not because of any deficiency in the number of employés, but because they are not properly employed. I do not say that they do not work, but they do not work upon any intelligent system whatever.

There have been made within the last year at least four changes in the head of that Department: Mr. Baker, Mr. Atkinson, Mr. Gill, and now Mr. Bentley. Mr. Baker perhaps did know his business; if so, he did not conduct it to the best good of the public. But the others certainly did not know their business.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman apply that remark to the present chief of the Pension Bureau?

Mr. JENKS. The present chief has not yet learned his duty. From what I know of him, I think he may make a very efficient officer.

Mr. KASSON. He is one of the most active, faithful, and efficient men I ever saw at the head of a Bureau.

Mr. JENKS. At all events, he does not now know all the business of the office. In 1866, with one hundred and seventy-five employés, the Pension Bureau adjudicated fifty thousand original cases. Last year, with over four hundred employés, there were only about twelve thousand original cases adjudicated. Before the Committee on Pensions we took the testimony of the chief clerk of the Pension Bureau, Mr. A. P. J. Clark. In answer to a question by one of the members of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. RUSK,] in regard to the finance division of the Pension Bureau, he testified as follows:

Question. How many desks are there in that division?
Answer. There are forty-eight persons employed in that division

Then, in reply to a question from the chairman of the committee, he testified as follows:

Question. Give us your best judgment. Ought that division not to be lopped off?
Answer. If the work in the Auditor's Office was up to date the work of that division would be useless.

Now, here are forty-eight employés in one division who, if the work in another Department was properly attended to, would be utterly useless. There is 22 per cent. that this most intelligent man, I believe an upright man, in that division swears would be useless if the work was up in the Auditor's Office. I believe there should be an increase of force in the Auditor's Office of perhaps ten clerks. But with the work in that Office up to date forty-eight men could be dispensed with in the finance bureau. There are one or two other divisions in that Bureau that are overcrowded. I apprehend that by the time this present Commissioner has studied the duties of his Office for one year he can do the whole work of it very well with two hundred employés, and better than it has been heretofore done with four hundred employés.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in connection with this bill so far as it relates to the reduction of the number of employés. I maintain, first, that there are a great many too many employés in all the Departments.

I say further that if the law is adhered to as to the number of hours that the clerks shall be employed even under this bill, with the reduced number of clerks that we allow, we can obtain as many hours of labor out of the reduced number of clerks for the next year as have been obtained from the larger number now employed in the Departments.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] talks about discretion in the character of appropriations.

Now the sundry civil bill is a fair illustration of the "discretion" which each House recognizes on these appropriation bills. The Executive Departments estimate that there should be appropriated for the sundry civil purposes of the Government $32,560,000. There was appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1876, according to the statement, $26,644,000, although the paper to which the gentleman from Ohio alluded a moment ago makes the appropriations of last year for sundry civil expenses $29,000,000. Now the House has appropriated $14,850,000 in the sundry civil bill; and I will show you what kind of "discretion" the Senate has exercised in connection with that bill. The Senate has added to it $3,644,274 for purposes of every description, none of them necessary and none of them, so far as I am able to see, required by law. That is the kind of "discretion" in the way of economy which the Senate exercises, and it is a kind of "discretion" which I hope this House will resist.

I now desire a vote, and call for the previous question on my motion that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

Mr. KASSON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that what gentlemen on his side call "reductions" are very largely mere postponements of expenditures, as for instance the appropriation for public buildings, fortifications, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be any branch of the public service that has been more improperly or corruptly administered than the expenditures of money upon public buildings, my experience does not show it.

Mr. KASSON. Well, Congress is responsible for it.

Mr. RANDALL. I say here that in connection with the expenditures for public buildings in years past there have been the grossest abuses that can be conceived of.

Mr. KASSON. Initiated by Congress in every case.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care who initiated them.

Mr. KASSON. I agree with the gentleman that there are evils in that direction needing correction; but nevertheless many of these expenditures will have to be made some time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. RANDALL, Mr. SINGLETON, and Mr. FOSTER as the committee of conference on the part of the House.

Mr. SEELYE. I now offer my resolution of instruction to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot instruct a conference committee. If bound by instruction, it would cease to be a conference committee.

Mr. SEELYE. Is it not within the power of the House to instruct its own committee?

Mr. RANDALL. The conference committee is composed in part of representatives of the Senate. Such a committee cannot be instructed without ceasing to be a conference committee.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] can accomplish his object by modifying the resolution so as to declare that "it is the sense of this House," &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct in saying that we cannot instruct a conference committee; because a conference between the two Houses must be "full and free."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the House can express its opinion in a resolution, without putting it in the form of instruction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. LEAVENWORTH,] being entitled to the floor on the Geneva award bill, yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for a specific purpose, which has now been accomplished. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. This resolution is proposed to be offered to express the sense of the House upon the subject-matter connected with the conference.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] yield for a moment to allow this resolution to be voted on?

Mr. RANDALL. Let him do so; I have no objection.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I yield for the purpose of having a vote taken, but not for any discussion.

Mr. SEELYE. I have no desire to discuss it. I offer the resolution, modifying it so as to declare that it is the opinion of this House, &c.; and upon the resolution I call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall desire to offer an amendment after the resolution is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this House that the committees of conference on the disagreements between the House and the Senate on the pending appropriation bills should hereafter seek an agreement in the first place upon matters which conform to present existing statutes, leaving matters of new legislation for secondary consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to amend by adding "except such items as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bills, would retrench expenditures."

Mr. SEELYE. I desire to have the question presented to the House without complication. I call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I offered my amendment before the previous question had been called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered his resolution and at once called for the previous question upon it. The only manner in which it can be amended will be by voting down the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded, there being—ayes 45, noes 77.

Mr. SEELYE. I withdraw the resolution. The gentleman from New York declined to yield for any purposes involving discussion or the consumption of time.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the withdrawal. The resolution is not now within the control of the gentleman; it is in the possession of the House; and I move the amendment I have indicated. Upon that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is before the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers to amend it.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] has a right to withdraw his proposition until the previous question is ordered or an amendment is adopted.

Mr. SEELYE. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] had yielded to me for the sake of introducing a resolution, on the ground that there would only be a vote upon it, and that it would entail no further delay. I feel that it is only good faith to him, inasmuch as the matter has become complicated, to withdraw my resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has no right to withdraw the resolution after there has been action upon it and the previous question has been called.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If the Chair has any doubt upon the subject, I can refer him to the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be very glad to have the gentleman refer to it.

Mr. KASSON. It is the fortieth rule, to be found on page 170, and reads as follows:

40. After a motion is stated by the Speaker or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in the possession of the House; but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.—April 7, 1789.

Mr. RANDALL. O, you are put right on this question of economy, and I insist on my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is compelled under the rules to decide that the gentleman from Massachusetts has a right to withdraw the resolution; and it is not before the House.

The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands in the State of Kansas in aiding the construction of a railroad, approved March 3, 1863, Mr. GOODIN, Mr. FULLER, and Mr. MCDILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 655) to confirm to the city of San José, in the State of California, the titles of certain lands.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of ten thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1875.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 567) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, and agreed to the conference asked for on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. BOUTWELL, and Mr. BOGY as managers of said conference on the part of the Senate.

GENEVA AWARD BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I had not originally intended to occupy any of the valuable time of this House on the question now under consideration. I had partially formed an opinion in regard to the decision of this matter, and I sat down to listen to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] with the full conviction that at the end of his argument, on whichever side it might be, I should doubtless be drawn to the same conclusions with himself. For that honorable gentleman, for his legal acumen, his sound, vigorous common sense, the unimpassioned and judicial fairness with which he approaches the consideration of every subject brought to our attention, I entertain the most profound respect. It is therefore with diffidence in the accuracy of my own judgment and with some hesitation that I proceed to reply to his able argument in support of the report of the majority of the committee and to assign my reasons for dissenting from his conclusions. The argument which he submitted to the House on this question entirely failed, however, to convince me of the correctness of the propositions which he endeavored to demonstrate and of the conclusions to which he arrived. The honorable gentleman from Iowa coincides in opinion with the majority of the committee and sustains their report, while I coincide in opinion with the minority and sustain their report.

He endeavored to satisfy this House of the justice of the conclusion to which the majority of the committee had arrived by an examination of the treaty and of the award and, as he said, of the action of the arbitrators. The latter part, unfortunately, he substantially overlooked. He did examine the treaty and he examined the award, and he thought he was able to deduce and maintain from the provisions of the treaty and from the award the conclusion that the United States reserved to itself the right to dispose of this award according to its best discretion.

I, on the other hand, examined the same treaty and the same award, and came to the conclusion that the United States has no right to dispose of the amount of this award except to those parties whose property was paid for by the award.

I think I may with great point and with entire propriety insist that the honorable gentleman has inadvertently confessed and admitted the fallacy of his own conclusion in the course of his remarks. His evenly-balanced and well-poised legal mind, together with his judicial fairness, compelled him to remark at one point in his argument as follows:

> My task shall be to establish the proposition that it is within the power of Congress to exercise a discretion in the distribution of this fund, and so to distribute it as to pay the actual sufferers the amounts which they lost by reason of Great Britain's wrong.

At another point in the argument of the honorable gentleman the same just view of the case is again expressed thus:

> I maintain that by reference to all of these (referring to the treaty, the award, and the proceedings of the arbitrators) it is apparent that the Government of the United States did retain control of this fund, the right to dispose of it to actual sufferers by reason of England's wrong, bounded only by the subject-matter of the arbitration.

Now, the honorable gentleman will not question the decisions of the arbitrators or their high and paramount authority. He will not go back of any decisions made at Geneva. But that honorable board decided that the very persons to whom the honorable gentleman proposes to distribute this fund were not "sufferers by reason of Great Britain's wrong." They unanimously decided that they had suffered nothing whatever by reason of England's wrong. In regard to them she had violated no law of neutrality, and therefore, according to the above proposition of the gentleman, they had not the slightest claim upon any part of the award. What, then, becomes of the gentleman's conclusion?

Allow me, however, Mr. Speaker, to examine some of the other grounds taken by the honorable gentleman from Iowa. He based his argument entirely on the provisions of the award and of the treaty, and he insisted that, as he found nothing in the treaty or in the award which bound the Government of the United States to dispose of this amount to any particular class of claimants, therefore the Government had a right to dispose of it according to its best judgment and discretion, overlooking the limitation above set forth by him.

How was it possible that the treaty should contain provisions for the distribution of the amount awarded, since at that time it was necessarily unknown what claims would be allowed, and what disallowed.

Why, too, should such a provision be embodied in the treaty, when England could have had no wish to insert it, and the United States were unwilling it should be done. What inference, then, can possibly arise from the fact that the treaty does not bind the United States to distribute the award to any particular claimant.

Now I hold, Mr. Speaker, that aside from this award and aside from this treaty, there are other great and important principles of right and justice which ought to govern this House in its final decision in this case: the great principles of right and justice which came down with our first parents from the eternal Throne; the principles promulgated among the lightnings and thunders of Mount Sinai, which have come down through all the ages, which are recognized in all lands, which are guaranteed not only by the Constitution of the United States, but by the constitution of every State in this Union; the right which every person has to the absolute possession of his own property. That is the great fundamental principle in my humble judgment on which this question ought to be decided. I have been surprised to see honorable gentlemen upon this floor, instead of submitting the question to the cool, deliberate, unbiased judgment of the House, appealing to its sympathies and to its prejudices, not willing to rest the case on the sober judgment of the House, not willing to have it decided in the manner in which this and all other great matters brought before us ought to be decided. The honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who addressed the House yesterday, spent a large part of his time in endeavoring to throw odium upon the insurance companies—to make them obnoxious to the prejudices of this House. I submit to every gentleman before me whether it is in good taste for statesmen on this floor, whether it is the duty or even the privilege of gentlemen here to attempt to appeal either to the sympathies or to the prejudices of honorable members. Now, both the gentleman from Maine and the honorable gentleman from Iowa referred in the course of their remarks to the rich insurance companies, and from time to time dwelt upon the fact that they were supposed to possess large amounts of accumulated wealth. Now, I submit that that is a most unfair, dangerous, and unworthy mode of presenting a question before this House. I submit that it is quite possible and perhaps probable that the wealth of these companies is not greater, perhaps not as great, as that of many of the large ship-owners whose vessels and cargoes are by the bill of the majority of the committee to have priority of payment from the proceeds of this award. Is there any evidence before the House, or any reason to suppose that the owners of the ships destroyed were not as wealthy as the insurance companies? Are the stockholders in insurance companies any more apt to be surfeited with money than the owners of the vessels destroyed? Are they any more so than Messrs. Lowe & Co., or Grinnell & Minturn? No matter how wealthy the stockholders in these insurance companies may be, there is no evidence before us that they are any more so than the owners of these vessels which by the terms of this bill have priority of payment. Are not all such appeals rather in the nature of a lawyer's argument in behalf of his clients? Do they not carry that aspect with them? Are they not rather the appeals which we have all often heard in cases where merits were wanting, where the speaker felt keenly the weakness of his case, and therefore appealed to sympathy or to prejudice rather than to the eternal principles of justice and right.

Again, the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] in his argument insisted because the arbitrators awarded a sum in gross, because this Government requested that a sum in gross should be awarded, because it directed our counsel at Geneva to make the request that the award might be in gross, that such fact furnishes strong evidence to show that the Government intended when it received the money to be at liberty to use its own discretion in disposing of it. Now I submit that it does not show any such thing. It no more justifies that conclusion than it does the very opposite conclusion that the Government intended that that money should be distributed precisely in the manner indicated by the report of the minority of the committee. It shows neither the one thing nor the other; it shows merely that they preferred that this Government should distribute the money rather than that England or the arbitrators should impose conditions upon its distribution. The Government of this country preferred to keep it in its own hands to be distributed as the justice and equity of the case might require. It does not furnish a particle of evidence to show that the Government did not intend that all persons whose property was paid for by the award should have their damages out of the sum awarded. We are bound to presume that the Government intended to do perfect and exact justice to all the parties in interest, and there is not a word in the treaty or in the award to militate against that conclusion.

The honorable gentleman greatly errs in the conclusion which he draws from the terms of the treaty. On the contrary, the treaty shows exactly the reverse of the conclusion which he draws from it. I want no better or other evidence to show that from the beginning to the end the Government has intended nothing less than that the money when recovered should go to pay the very damages awarded for the very property destroyed and which England was adjudged liable and bound to pay for for her violation of her obligations as a neutral. If the Government did not intend that, then I affirm that it was guilty in the first place of a most gross and infamous fraud and swindle on the claimants in this case. If the Government intended originally or at any time thereafter to get these claims into its hands, to negotiate with England for their payment; if it made this treaty, caused the arbitrators to be appointed, and finally obtained this award of $15,500,000, all the time intending when the award was obtained to dispose of it according to its discretion, without respect to the persons or corporations the value of whose vessels and cargoes was included in the award, then it intended as gross a swindle on those persons whose claims were placed in its hands as ever dishonored the most corrupt of governments. But I insist that the Government intended no such thing. It would be a gross impeachment of the character of several of the most honorable and distinguished officers of the Government to suggest it.

The very treaty itself shows that the Government all the time intended to recognize the respective rights of the owners of these claims. What does the tenth article of the treaty provide for? It provides that if the arbitrators did not award a sum in gross—and it was within the election of the arbitrators to award the one or the other, as they in their judgment might deem best—then a board of assessors should be appointed who should assess the amount of each claimant's damages so far as Great Britain should by their decision be held bound for the payment of such damages. Now I have heard no gentleman on this floor, and I presume there is no one here who will, deny that, if these assessors had been appointed under the tenth article of the treaty and had made an assessment of the damages in the case of each individual, each person whose damages were thus assessed would have received the precise amount of his assessed damages. Is there any gentleman here who claims that that is not so? No gentleman on this floor has yet taken any such ground. The terms of the tenth article of the treaty are too plain to be misunderstood. And if they do not take that ground then they admit that by the very terms of the treaty the Government recognized the right of the respective owners of this property, and the principle that when the value of the property was assessed by the assessors each of the owners would be entitled to receive the precise amount at which his damages were assessed. Therefore the meaning and intention of the Government is that expressed in the tenth section of the treaty; that section can mean nothing but that no interpretation of its meaning has been or can be made so unfair, so distorted, as to impute to it any other or different meaning. No one has even attempted it.

But, if the construction of the honorable gentleman from Iowa is true, then the Government, in addition to a gross fraud and swindle on the sufferers, is guilty in the second place of this duplicity: If it was intended by the seventh article of the treaty, as contended by the honorable gentleman, that in case the award was made in gross it would do what it pleased with the money, using simply its own discretion in the distribution, and also intended by the tenth section that if the damages were assessed then the claimants should receive the pay for their property according to the assessment, then this Government "of the people, for the people," was guilty of an infamous and most fraudulent act of double-dealing and deceit; this Government secretly and clandestinely intended by one article of the treaty to do just what it professed to be doing and just what it was in common honesty bound to do, to obtain, if possible by the decision of the arbitrators, full compensation from Great Britain for the damages sustained by each claimant by her wrongful act, while at the same time by another article of the same treaty the Government intended when the money was obtained to set up the new, unheard-of, monstrous, and wicked claim that, by some mysterious process, (which has not yet been satisfactorily explained, although a number of these gentlemen have attempted it, each in a way peculiar to himself, and entirely different from the other,) this $15,500,000 of the property of our fellow-citizens has without any warning or notice become the property of the Government, to be disposed of as our sympathies or our prejudices may dictate. All this is simply a reductio ad absurdum. It is not to be believed for one moment that the Government of this great country had two antagonistic ideas in its mind when it made this treaty, by virtue of one of which they could cheat those claimants whose damages were paid by this award out of their claims, and give the sum awarded to whomever they pleased, and by virtue of the other they would give the claimants respectively the amounts awarded to them by the assessors. Yet that is the very disgraceful and dishonorable position in which the honorable gentleman from Iowa would place the Government, under the seventh and tenth articles of this treaty.

The honorable gentleman says further along in his argument that this treaty expressly provides that all claims submitted to the arbitrators shall be satisfied, settled, and forever barred by virtue of that arbitration; and that therefore, inasmuch as all the claims presented to the board were satisfied, every person who presented his claim has had it satisfied, and therefore every claimant ought to receive his pay. Is that a conclusion which can be drawn from these premises by any fair and legitimate construction?

Let us look at it for a moment. In the first place there never was a treaty negotiated by the Government of the United States for the adjustment of the claims of our citizens, from the time of its first formation down to this day, which did not provide that the arbitrators, commissioners, or assessors, whenever they had examined the claims presented to them, should make a final award, and that award should forever bar and satisfy all claims up to a certain time named in such treaty. When in 1857 we entered into a treaty with New Grenada for the adjustment of the claims of forty years' standing, including those growing out of the Panama riot, it expressly provided that all claims, whether presented or allowed or not, were to be forever settled and barred.

The language of the fifth article of that treaty is as follow:

> The proceedings of this commission shall be final and conclusive with respect to all the claims before it, and its awards shall be a full discharge to New Grenada of all claims of citizens of the United States against that Republic, which may have occurred prior to the signature of this convention.

Whether a claim was allowed or rejected, whether it was presented or not, it was forever satisfied and discharged.

The money in that case was paid by the government of New Grenada to the Government of the United States in gross sums and just as it is here. Large claims were allowed by the commissioners. Claimants who lost large amounts of money had their claims disallowed on the ground that New Grenada was not liable to the payment of those claims. Now, I would inquire why it was that those claimants whose claims were disallowed did not come in and insist that their claims should be paid out of the funds received. Why did they not claim that the treaty was made by the act of the Government and at its own cost, and the fund was paid to the Government and in gross; that the Government had the fund under its own control? Their claims were forever barred, and they never had or could have any further claim against New Grenada. Unfortunately for that class of claimants whose claims were then disallowed by the commissioners, this new invention, which has been devised for this occasion, that the Government might take the money received for the valid and allowed claims and apply it to the payment of the claims which were invalid and disallowed, had not then been dreamed of. There were but a few hundred thousands of dollars involved in that treaty; this involves many millions. The money was paid in gross sums. What was the difference between their claims and the claims of gentlemen here to-day whose claims were disallowed by the arbitrators at Geneva? Yet I venture to say that the idea never entered the mind of any one, it was never dreamed of, that any person whose claim was disallowed on that occasion had any right to the money which had been allowed for the damages sustained by others. But why not? It was paid in gross. The treaty provided expressly that it was to be a final bar to any further claim. These claims could never be brought up again against New Grenada. They had no claims against this country. Why should they not come in and have their pay precisely on the same footing as those persons to whom damages were not allowed by the arbitrators at Geneva? I see no reason. I can see none. Up to the time of the Geneva award it had never been claimed that the Government had any discretion in this distribution of a fund received by virtue of an award for specific damages.

Gentlemen urge that in this case they ought to have their pay, because their claims were satisfied by the arbitration. The final award of course closed up and forever barred all claims they could ever have on the government of Great Britain. That was the very object of the treaty, was it not? The treaty was made for the express purpose of settling forever all this matter in controversy in regard to the Alabama claims. If the claims disallowed, just as much as those allowed, had not been barred, the great object of the treaty would have failed entirely. To say, therefore, that these persons whose claims were disallowed by the arbitrators may come in here and ask payment out of the amount allowed for damages sustained by other persons seems to me to be one of the most monstrous, one of the most unreasonable, one of the most unprecedented and unjust claims that ever was advanced in any court of justice or any legislative hall. In nearly or quite every treaty made by the Government for the adjustment of the claims of our citizens there is a similar provision. Without it the treaty would be idle and nugatory. The claims which are not presented and those which are presented and disallowed are as perfectly satisfied by the treaty as if allowed and paid. But in all times past never did a claimant whose claim was declared invalid and rejected come forward to demand payment from the sum awarded on the claims allowed on the ground that his claim was satisfied, for the simple reason that it had been decided that he had no claim which the foreign government was bound to pay. His damages were sustained without wrong from any quarter.

The gentleman further claimed in the course of his remarks that the United States, in all its transactions, did not act as an agent, did not act as an attorney for the parties who had sustained these damages; that all the evidence in the case showed that the Government did not act in that capacity. His language is very explicit:

> It is claimed that the United States acted in that arbitration as the attorney or as the agent of these claimants. I deny it. There is no evidence to support it. All the evidence contradicts the proposition.

That was a most bold and extraordinary proposition for the gentleman to put forth in view of all the evidence in this case. I undertake to say that not one single factor is wanting which is necessary in order to constitute this Government an agent of the claimants in this whole matter. I undertake to say that this is just what our Government has been doing from the day of its organization down to this, and that she is doing it to-day in other cases besides this, and has been doing it continually year after year ever since the existence of every gentleman on this floor. What higher duty, I would like to ask, is there for any government to perform than the duty of protecting the property and vindicating the rights of her citizens which have been trampled upon by foreign nations! This is the first duty which a government owes to its citizens, and it is so laid down in all the elementary works. A private individual has no right to redress his own wrongs. Our citizens living on the Rio Grande, who are continually invaded from Mexico, have no right to cross the frontier and redress their injuries. That would involve this country immediately in a war. It is a right which is denied to them, and must be denied to them. The citizen owes obedience to his Government and the Government owes protection to its citizens; and when his rights are invaded by a foreign government, the Government steps in in his behalf and, as his agent, vindicates his rights. This is laid down in all the elementary works. (See Phillimore, volume 3, part 9, chapter 2.)

But the whole evidence in this case shows, if it shows anything, that this Government in this transaction was acting in no other capacity than as an agent. In the first place, on the 22d of September, 1865, she sends out her circulars to all persons who sustained damage by virtue of these cruisers and invites them to send in their claims, made out in form, with claimants' names, dates, &c., proposing to enforce them. She makes a formal tender of her agency in express terms. Then she requests these claimants in so many words to ask the Government to present their claims as claims against Great Britain.

This request will be found in said circular in these very words:

> It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms.

What was all this but an express offer to accept the agency and a request to be thus employed?

Then she takes the claims into her hands and sends them to our minister in England precisely as she had asked to be requested to do; she causes them to be regularly drawn up and presented in the names of the several claimants to the British government. Finally, the British government not acceding to the claims, she procures a board of arbitrators to pass upon these claims. She presents them to that board of arbitrators, drawn up in the manner above stated, with the name of every claimant, the amount of his claim, the vessel destroyed, the vessel by which it was destroyed. The justice and validity of these claims are urged by the Government's counsel. Finally she procures from that tribunal of arbitrators a decision declaring precisely which of these claims shall be allowed and which shall not be. Yet it is said that in all this she was not an agent for the parties whose property was destroyed by these cruisers and whose claims for such destruction she had undertaken to enforce! Is there wanting any factor to make her an agent? What single act beside could she have done to make her an agent? And yet the honorable gentleman from Iowa denies that there is any evidence to support it. Why, sir, there is no evidence wanting; she has always acted as the agent of her citizens in all cases of this kind. She makes treaties as their agent. This is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. She makes them, it is true, in the name of the nation. Does that divest a citizen of his right to his property? Of course a treaty can be made in no other way. But does the claim of a citizen then become the property of the nation! A treaty cannot very well be made by a foreign power with the claimants themselves. It cannot be made with a private individual; it must be made and always is made with the nation as such. It is a treaty between two nations; but it is a treaty for the purpose of enforcing the rights of individuals, not for the purpose of confiscating their property and plundering them of their rights.

Let us suppose for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that my honorable friend from Iowa, who is a very distinguished member of the bar of that State, should himself solicit one of his many clients to intrust to him certain claims to be enforced, as was done in this case; that he should receive them for that purpose; put them in proper form; demand their payment; insist on their justice; consent to an arbitration; go before the arbitrators and present them again and urge their payment; procure an award in his client's favor, and receive the amount, and then turn round to his client and deny his agency and claim that the money was his own! How long would the gentleman's name remain enrolled among the members of the bar of Iowa? But the thing is not to be supposed. That honorable gentleman would never place himself in the dishonorable, humiliating position in which he places our country.

Now, again, it was alleged in the argument of this same question in the former Congress that the persons who lost these vessels had no rights to be redressed, because they could not enforce any right either against Great Britain or against the United States. Therefore it was insisted that they had no right in this case and no interest in the award. And there was cited an authority which I believe I have here, the case of Campbell vs. Mullett, 2 Swanston's Reports, 551.

This same most remarkable doctrine is again advanced here to sustain the report of the majority of this committee, and may be found in the report, page 3.

But that frail fallacy never had any foundation upon which to rest itself, either in the forum of the law or of common sense, and is overruled by Judge Story for all future time in the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters, pages 216, 217, in which case he insists that, although a right may not be capable of being enforced by means of any legal proceedings against any government whatever, it is precisely as much a right as if it could be enforced.

The following is the language of Judge Story in the case above cited. Speaking of the opinion of the court in Campbell vs. Mullett, he says:

> Such is the language of the learned judge, and we cannot say that the reasoning is at all satisfactory. It is not universally, though it may ordinarily be, one test of right that it may be enforced in a court of justice. Claims and debts due from a sovereign are not ordinarily capable of being so enforced. Neither the king of Great Britain nor the Government of the United States is suable in the ordinary courts of justice for debts due by either; yet who will doubt that such debts are rights? It does not follow because an unjust sentence is irreversible, that the party has lost all right to justice or all claim upon principles of public law to remuneration. With reference to mere municipal law he may be without remedy; but with reference to principles of international law, he has a right both to the justice of his own and the foreign sovereign. The theory, too, that an indemnification for unjust captures is to be deemed, if not a mere deviation, as in the nature of a donation, as contrasted with right, is not admissible.

Why, sir, what could be more absurd than to insist that a contractor for carrying United States mails had no right to his pay because he could not collect it by law? Did any one ever think of using such language? And yet he cannot enforce it in any court, because the United States is not capable of being sued. No private individual could have sued the government of England for any of her wrongful acts, and yet they had rights which by the laws of nations she was bound to recognize. Having these rights, owning this property destroyed, the question arises, how were they divested of this property? At what period in this transaction and by what new and unheard-of process did the owners of these vessels destroyed by the three inculpated cruisers become divested of their rights? No one denies that the insurance companies, after they paid the full value of a vessel or her cargo became subrogated to the rights of the original owners. That principle is found in all the books, and was admitted by the counsel of Great Britain at Geneva. Now, in what manner was that right of the insurance companies divested? Their right was absolute when they paid in full. Was it divested when they put the claim into the hands of this Government at its special solicitation to act as their agents in enforcing it? Was it divested when this Government sent these claims to England and presented them to the British government in the names of the several owners? Did that divest them of their right? Were they divested of their right when the Government agreed to a board of arbitrators to decide as to their rights? Were they divested of their right by the solemn award of the most august tribunal which the world has ever seen expressly declaring that England had failed in her duty as a neutral, and was bound to pay for all damages sustained by the acts of the three inculpated cruisers and their tenders, and awarding $15,500,000 for that purpose, or did they lose their rights when the fund awarded to pay their damages passed into the hands of their agents, the Government of the United States? Which of all these processes divested the right of these parties to the property they owned? It is absurd to talk of its being divested, and it is equally absurd to talk about this Government having any kind of right in this property, except the right to pay it over to the parties for whom it was intended by the award of the arbitrators, and whose property destroyed by these three rebel cruisers constituted the measure and the ground of the damages awarded.

Again, how came the United States to have a right in this property? I will attend to the argument of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] before I am through. But how does it happen, by what legerdemain, by what feat of prestidigitation does it happen that the United States, without having ever parted with any property, without having done anything to entitle herself to it, without any consideration whatever passing from her, without any claim on Great Britain which the board ever dignified with a hearing, and without even a suspicion on her own part that she had any such rights, has come to be the possessor of $15,500,000 of property? Can any gentleman tell? Why, sir, no two gentlemen who have addressed this House have agreed upon the same mode by which that property was divested. No two of them have found out that the Government became the possessor of this property, to be used at its discretion, by the same or even by a similar course of reasoning. The fallacy of all their reasoning on this most important point is made the more manifest by the entire want of harmony in their views.

The gentleman from Iowa says the United States has rights in this property because it was awarded to her as a nation; but does that give it to this Government? Why, sir, an award has never been made to the United States that was not made to her as a nation. It cannot be made in any other way. The money that came from New Granada came to this country as a nation. It was demanded from New Granada as a nation, and came to the United States as a nation. But did the United States claim the very slightest right or interest in it as a nation? No, sir. Had it not been for this being so vast an amount of money, fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, we should never have heard of such a claim. It is because there is so large an amount.

Not one dollar in all the past history of the country was ever before claimed under any such wicked and fraudulent pretense.

The honorable gentleman quotes from the opinion of the court in the case of Rhinds vs. The United States before the Alabama commissioners, as follows:

> The award was made in favor of the Government and not in favor of the claimant. The Government thus vindicated the national honor, but it did not assume to pay any particular class of claimants nor any particular claim. Having obtained the money by its own act and at its own cost, it had the right to prescribe the terms on which the distribution should be made.

I feel no diffidence in declaring that the above opinion is neither law, nor justice, nor common sense. To lay down the principle that because the Government procures an award or funds in any manner from a foreign government by its own act and at its own cost for damages sustained by our citizens gives to the government the slightest right in the fund recovered is utterly abhorrent to every principle of justice and common honesty. No such doctrine has ever before been put forth. No such principle up to this time in our history has ever been acted upon. It is the highest and most imperative duty of the Government to vindicate the rights of our citizens, to protect them in the enjoyment of all their rights both at home and abroad. But the protection which the honorable gentleman from Iowa approves is the protection which the vulture gives to the lamb. As she enforces the payment of the claims of all our citizens in foreign countries "by her own acts and at her own cost," she possesses in all cases the right to rob and to reward whomsoever she will, if the above dictum has any foundation in law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] who sits before me, and whose great learning I very much admire and respect, has invented another source of title in the Government and an entirely different one, and I think the gentleman is entitled to the merit of original discovery for the learned argument which he made and the title which he invented. It was an argument or idea never suggested by anybody down to that time. Mr. Seward had never thought of making any such claim on the ground of "paramount right." Mr. Fish never made a claim on any such ground. Mr. Adams never made it in any communication which he addressed to the British government. It was never insisted on at all before the arbitrators at Geneva, and it was never thought of or dreamed of by any one until it sprang from the active brain of my learned friend from Pennsylvania. When that gentleman made his remarks we heard for the first time of this "paramount right in the government."

I hope the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania will excuse me for calling to mind and quoting the words of a distinguished gentleman of ancient times on an occasion slightly similar, when he said to another learned and distinguished gentleman:

> "Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad."

Now let us look at this question of "paramount right" invented by the honorable gentleman. The gentleman proved that for a certain length of time we actually had a rebellion in this country. He satisfied everybody in this House of that fact. He showed also satisfactorily that the rebels eventually acquired belligerent rights. I think there was no doubt of that fact before the gentleman proved it. He showed further that they acquired the same rights as they would have acquired had they been a foreign nation. And there was no doubt of that fact. But the gentleman claimed in addition that when they took one of our vessels and held it for twenty-four hours they thereby acquired an absolute right to it, and the municipal title of the owner was divested and extinguished. I should have no hesitation in admitting that to be so if it were a fact. But I doubt its being a fact. I have never heard of a title being divested by the capturing of a vessel and the holding of it for any length of time, unless it was adjudicated upon by a court and an adjudication made in favor of the captor. I suppose that would pass a perfect title, and that nothing short of that would do so. But on this point I am not particular.

Let us see what were the arguments of the gentleman. He said the municipal title of the owner of the property was utterly extinguished and gone whenever the capture took place. But I would like to know of the honorable gentleman whether the "paramount title" of the Government was not also gone in that event, and at the same time? When a vessel was captured, and when she was burned, when her entire spars and sails and hull were all converted into ashes, I think the title was very much gone, whether we consider the paramount title of the Government or the title of the owner. There was nothing left to which a title could attach.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HANCOCK.) Yes, sir. The gentleman has occupied thirty minutes.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I thought we were under the hour rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The statement made to the present occupant of the chair was that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] was limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. LORD. I will explain this. I was asked by the Speaker to mark down the times which I understood the different gentlemen who were to speak would occupy. I marked some thirty minutes, and some fifteen minutes; and I marked thirty minutes' time to the gentleman from New York, having understood that he was only to speak for that time. If he desires to speak at greater length, I presume there will be no objection to his time being extended.

There was no objection, and Mr. LEAVENWORTH'S time was extended.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. When a vessel was seized by one of these inculpated cruisers which was burned and destroyed no one possessed anything that could be called a title to that which had no existence, but the title was converted into a right, and when a vessel was destroyed by one of the inculpated cruisers the owner of the vessel had a claim to be paid by Great Britain, provided she had been guilty of any wrongful act under the laws of neutrality. This right survives the destruction of the vessel. Under that head Mr. Story declares, as quoted above, that that right is perfect, and although it cannot be enforced by law, still it can be enforced by treaty. But although the title of the owner had ceased with the destruction of his vessel, the title also of the Government went with it, and was as much extinguished as the title of the individual. What then becomes of the honorable gentleman's theory that it was on this paramount title of the Government, which had already ceased to have any existence after the destruction of the vessel, that we had obtained this award? I think it safe to say that this invention to justify the Government in plundering the citizen of his property will hardly bear the test of a careful examination.

But, in the first place, I might go further and say there never was any such principle as a paramount title in the Government to my watch. The Government has always had the right of eminent domain by virtue of which it can take possession of any real estate if necessary for its own use, but what other title the Government has I never heard, and I suspect the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself never heard of it until he devised and constructed that ingenious argument to which we all listened with so much pleasure.

Mr. JENKS. Suppose in time of war you were to sell your watch to an enemy, would not your title be gone and that of the Government remain?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. No, sir; I do not think the Government would have any title whatever; I never have heard that the Government had any title in it or could acquire any.

I have thus examined with some care two of the mysterious ways by which the Government is supposed to have become the owner of the property of these insurance companies, or if not the owners then such a trustee that the Government can give away the proceeds of their property according to its sovereign will and pleasure, which to the companies is just the same thing. These two modes have nothing in common, nothing very satisfactory.

We will now examine the third mode, which was devised by the majority of the committee and will be found in their report. It will be found in the following series of abstract propositions, which I propose to examine in detail:

Great Britain did not become liable to any citizen of the United States for any loss sustained by him by reason of such cruisers. Neither could such citizen make any legal claim therefor upon his own Government. The wrongs done by Great Britain to the United States were treated throughout as a national claim. The moneys paid therefor were paid "by the government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States," and "the United States" is made the respondent upon the prosecution of any claim before the court organized by the act of Congress.

The first proposition is that Great Britain did not become liable to any citizen of the United States for any loss sustained by him by reason of such cruisers.

This proposition is not true. She did become liable. In Comegys vs. Vasse Judge Story expressly affirms the liability and the claimant's right. If there was no liability on the part of England, why did Governor Seward request that the claims should be forwarded to him with a request in express terms for his interposition with the British government?

If there was no liability, why were the claims presented to the British government and their payment demanded; why presented to the arbitrators by our counsel and insisted upon?

Why, too, did the arbitrators recognize and affirm such liability by their award and by the following language in it:

And whereas, in order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages which have been sustained, it is necessary to set aside all double claims for the same losses and all claims for "gross freights" so far as they exceed "net freights."

Again, too, if there was no liability, how remarkable that the President in his message of December 5, 1870, should recommend Congress to purchase these very claims, "so that the Government should have the ownership of the private claims as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain."

Will the committee still insist that "Great Britain did not become liable to any citizen of the United States for any loss sustained by him by such cruisers?" I think not. In the face of such proof of her liability, such an affirmation would involve the very sublimity of audacity. That proposition must be abandoned. The liability existed; the power to enforce it by the citizen was all that was wanting. The right itself was perfect, and so held by the arbitrators.

The next abstract proposition is that—

Neither could such citizen make any legal claim therefor on his own Government.

This is true; but it is no more true than it is that he could not make any legal claim therefor on Denmark or Japan. But how does that proposition, when admitted, aid the Government in acquiring a right in or over this award? The sufferers made no claim on the United States; they simply requested that she should perform the duty which she owed them, as she had done a hundred times before.

The third proposition is as follows:

The wrongs done by Great Britain to the United States were treated throughout as a national claim.

This is true also; but those claims were every one of them rejected and disallowed by the board and expressly abandoned by our agent.

But the wrongs done to our citizens were treated as private claims, indemnity for which, as in all other similar cases, was demanded by the Government, who alone could demand it. They were so treated by Governor Seward and Mr. Adams, so presented and urged by our agent, so spoken of by the arbitrators, so mentioned by the President.

Congress undoubtedly has the power to cover this $15,500,000 into the Treasury or grant it for the support of common schools. But this does not furnish the very faintest evidence of her right to do so. Neither does the fact that she has made herself respondent throw the faintest gleam of light upon the only question at issue—the right of the Government to this fund or to its distribution as she may please.

These are the only propositions on which the majority of the committee found the right of the Government to distribute this money according to its discretion. To me they are most unsatisfactory.

We commence with a perfect title to the property vested in the companies. We find it recognized by every officer of the Government holding any relation to it, recognized by the board, embodied in the award, and finally paid to the Government. But at some point they have lost their recognized rights in this mysterious game of "now you see it, and now you don't." It has slipped through their fingers and gone to parties having no claims.

But suppose for a moment that these claims had been so treated by the Government; has it come to this, that the Government can by this or any other such shallow device convert the property of the citizen into that of the nation? It is unheard of. It is preposterous.

Once more:

The moneys paid therefor were paid by the government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States.

Can it be possible that this proposition can be seriously urged as furnishing the minutest possible ground for the Government's claiming any interest whatever in this fund? It is utterly puerile. It would convert every dollar which the Government has ever received from foreign governments for damages done to our citizens into the property of the Government. It has in all cases been paid "to the Government of the United States."

And last and least, the report declares that—

The United States is made the respondent upon the prosecution of any claim before the court organized by the act of Congress.

This can scarcely require a reply.

I have thus examined with some care all these dissimilar modes of converting the property of private citizens into the property of the Government without their knowledge and against their will.

As a further and last reply to all of them, Mr. Speaker, allow me to suppose that these inculpated cruisers had escaped from British ports in violation of the three articles contained in the treaty, but that they had done no damages to the property of our citizens. The violation of the law and the national claim would have been perfect. But would the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman on this floor hazard his reputation as a sane man by claiming that the Government would have had any claim for pecuniary damages or would have made any such claim? But if not, then these gentlemen are all compelled to admit that the property destroyed by the three cruisers was the ground of the award or the measure and foundation for the damages awarded. This property furnished the only ground on which the award could stand. Take it away, and what ground is left? Who, then, by the simplest rules of the most common and indifferent honesty, should have the sum awarded? Why pile up this great accumulation of refined and subtle fallacies, of learned and elegant nonsense, to bewilder the understanding and obscure a subject so simple and plain?

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. FORT. I should like to have the distinguished gentleman from New York, who seems to speak with so much fairness on the question, reply to the suggestion that the insurance companies have already assessed their customers in war risks and have been paid all their losses.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I will with great pleasure give you my views on that subject. The law of the last session provided in effect that if any insurance company had in fact received $5 more in war premiums than it had lost by the destruction of vessels, it should not receive $1 for the lost property destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, although the property thus owned had been decided by the arbitrators to have been illegally destroyed by Great Britain, and the Government had the money awarded by the arbitrators to pay for that very property in its hands. That law was indeed to this effect: That if a vessel was captured by the inculpated cruisers and destroyed and was insured for one-half of its value, and that half was paid for by the company insuring, whereby the company became the owner of one-half of the vessel and the original owner still retained the other half, the original owner should be paid in full for his half of the vessel, but the company should not receive a dollar for the other half, provided the company had received $5 more for war premiums than the amount of its losses.

Now I want to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if it is right and just that an insurance company with a million dollars perhaps of capital should for three or four years use that capital in insuring vessels exposed to these hazards and should not receive any compensation whatever if the amount they had received in war premiums exceeded by $5 the amount lost by the destruction of vessels insured; that they should not receive $1 compensation for the use of their capital in all that time, provided the war premium exceeded their loss to any amount however small?

Now let us look at the question on the other side. Suppose that Messrs. Lowe & Co. and Messrs. Grinnell, Minturn & Co. sent vessels out to sea without insurance, and suppose that in three or four years they made $3,000,000, as it is possible they did, and lost one vessel by one of the inculpated cruisers, you pay them the entire value of their property, although in three years they made more money than any of the insurance companies. Is that the principle of justice? Will this House sanction such a wrong? Is there any law, or justice, or propriety in such a distribution of these funds? Yet that is the law that was passed at the last session, and the honorable gentleman from Iowa says it is too late to correct any error in it.

Mr. FORT. Who lost the money, the insurance companies or the insured?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. They lost, or may have lost, the use of millions of capital during that period, and yet they get no compensation for it under the law; but Lowe & Co. and Grinnell, Minturn & Co., although they may have made $3,000,000, or any other sum, during those years, may, under the proposed law, have entire compensation for the vessels they lost, for which the British government was never liable to pay $1.

It was decided by the board of arbitrators that the owners of vessels destroyed had no just claim for damages done by any of the rebel cruisers excepting the three cruisers and their tenders, the inculpated Alabama, the Florida, and Shenandoah only after she left Melbourne, with their several tenders. It was decided that the owners of the vessels destroyed by all the other rebel cruisers had no claim whatever against Great Britain. This decision was unanimous in regard to all the cruisers except the Retribution, and in regard to her it was decided by a vote of three to two. Mr. Adams, our own arbitrator, concurred in the decision as to all the cruisers except the Retribution.

It was decided that Great Britain had never done a single act in connection with any other vessels, except the three inculpated cruisers and their tenders, by which she had made herself liable for damages done by them. Why, then, do these claimants whose claims were rejected by the board appear here? Why do they come here and claim that by some species of legerdemain, which gentlemen cannot explain, the gross value of all the vessels destroyed by the inculpated cruisers and awarded by the arbitrators and paid by Great Britain has passed into the hands of the Government, and that that amount has in some mysterious manner, about which they are entirely unable to agree, become the property of the Government, and that this body, of which we form a part, can do what it pleases with its distribution.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to be understood as holding that this money belongs to the Government at all, because I think that if any money remains after all the claims are paid it should be returned to Great Britain.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. FORT. I think so.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Suppose the sum awarded was not sufficient to pay for the destruction of vessels by the inculpated cruisers, for the damage done for which Great Britain was adjudged liable by the board of arbitrators, would we have any claim upon Great Britain for more?

Mr. FORT. No; because we settled that question.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. We have settled the whole question, and received $15,500,000 for doing so.

Mr. FORT. But in all honor, if we got too much we ought to return the surplus.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. No, sir. England would not have been bound in honor to pay more had the award been insufficient, and we are not bound in honor to return anything if we have received too much. There is a contingency in each direction, but the award is final and one balances the other.

Again, it is said by the gentleman from Iowa that we do not know how this award was made up; and in the report of the majority of the committee, quoting from Justice Raynor, I find the following:

> It does not appear from the award or protocols what claims or losses are included in the amount awarded.

That is a very bold audacious assertion for the gentleman to make on this floor with that award lying before us, and with the plain, undeniable, and admitted decision of the arbitrators that the Government as such had no claim whatever on Great Britain, and the agent of the United States assenting to this decision and declaring that the claims on behalf of the Government "will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made." (Protocol 4, id., volume 4, page 19;) that the owners of all the vessels destroyed by all the cruisers of the rebel government except by the three inculpated cruisers, including the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, also had no claim whatever against the British government, and were therefore not included in the award. It is a little bold under such circumstances for the gentleman to say that we do not know how the award was made up, when no one can fail to know it without shutting his eyes and refusing to see what any one must see who will take the award of the arbitrators and read it.

We certainly do know, in the first place, what was not included in it. No language could possibly make it clearer. They included no claims in favor of this Government, for they were both excluded by the arbitrators and withdrawn by our agent, and the arbitrators were distinctly informed that they might exclude them from any award which might be made.

It did not include indemnity for any damages done by any of the rebel cruisers, except the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, and their tenders, the Tuscaloosa, the Clarence, the Tacony, and the Archer.

As to all the other rebel cruisers, the board unanimously decided (our own arbitrator, Mr. Adams, joining in it) that Great Britain had been guilty of no violation of the three rules set forth in the treaty, nor of any rule of international law.

In the second place we also know with equal, perfect certainty precisely what damages were included in the award, and that the damages thus included embrace all those direct damages done by the said three inculpated cruisers and their tenders, and no others whatever. I cannot but sympathize with any gentleman who is so unfortunate as to be able to peruse the clear and intelligible English of the said award and fail to discover the foregoing facts. The award is clear, explicit, and incapable of misinterpretation.

How the precise sum of $15,500,000 was reached we do not know, nor is it material; no doubt by mutual concessions, as is generally done by juries and arbitrators.

Mr. FORT. After all the claims included in the award are paid and there are one, two, or ten million dollars left; what would the gentleman do with the amount? Would it belong to the Government or to private individuals?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I would put it in the Treasury.

Mr. FORT. It is not ours.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. They awarded it to us.

Mr. FORT. For what?

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. For the damages our citizens sustained by the inculpated cruisers and their tenders. What if they have overrated the amount; but it is not probable on the evidence that they overrated it; at all events, we need not raise that question until we come to it, for it is not probable that it can ever arise.

Mr. FORT. Certainly not.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. But I was about to inquire of the honorable gentleman from Iowa by what process it was that he divested these claimants of their rights. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides that no person shall be divested of his property except by due process of law. We have here property to the amount of $14,000,000 and over; there is no dispute about the existence of the property or the persons who owned it. The title of the property was perfect in American citizens, and the Constitution guarantees that they shall not be divested of it except by due process of law.

Now, is the action of this Congress due process of law? The gentleman is an able and learned lawyer, and he knows very well that in the proper constitutional meaning of the term the action of this Legislature is not due process of law. The meaning of that term has been settled long since. It has been held that property can be divested only by a regular course of proceedings in courts of law. We have no right here in this Legislature to take away a citizen's property; we have no right to take a man's watch out of his pocket by an act of Congress. Yet the honorable gentleman proposes to take this property which belongs to those parties whose damages are included in this award and divest them of it and grant it to other parties who had no more claim on Great Britain than on the honorable gentleman or myself. They have no claim on England or on this country or on any other country. Their loss involved a violation of no law and can give no right. What becomes, then, of the property included in the award? How do the owners become divested of it? It was theirs when destroyed. Is it not so still, in whatever form it may exist?

As I said before, I have not been able to discover by what ingenuity it was that the Government acquired any right whatever in this property. What I have discovered is this, that from the very commencement of these proceedings down to the last hour when the cash was handed over this Government never pretended or asked to do any such thing. Mr. Seward, in all his communications with our citizens, and our minister, Mr. Adams, treated these claims as the claims of our citizens; they were presented to the British government by Mr. Adams as the claims of our citizens. They were presented in like manner by our agent at Geneva to the arbitrators, and their justice and validity insisted upon. They were allowed before the arbitrators as the claims of our citizens, and were included in their award. The money has been received from Great Britain to satisfy these claims of our citizens. Yet without any due process of law, without allowing any claimant to go into court and vindicate his claim to this property, the Government now proposes to take it out of the possession of those who owned the property for which it was awarded and give it to those whose claims were rejected and disallowed.

In support of that point I would refer to what Mr. Seward said in numerous letters recognizing these claims. Mr. Adams also recognized them in presenting them to England in the names of the several claimants. They were recognized by the Government counsel in the most remarkable manner. This recognition crops out in almost every paper read. In their counter-case the American counsel claimed that the British government should pay 7 per cent. interest on the amount awarded. Why was the British government to pay 7 per cent. interest instead of 6 or 8? Was it because the United States Government paid that interest? Not at all. If the proceeds of the award were claimed by the Government of the United States as its own and were paid to the United States as such, then the claim ought to have been for 6 per cent., which I believe is the interest which the Government pays. Did the counsel so say? It is a very remarkable fact that this is what they said.

> The usual rate of interest in the city of New York, where most of the claims of the individuals are held, is 7 per cent. per annum.

How came the counsel of the Government at Geneva to talk about the claims being held in the city of New York? The whole argument of the majority of this committee, the argument of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS,] the argument of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] and of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] proceed upon the idea that these claims did not belong to these gentlemen in New York, nor to any claimants whatever, but only to the United States, to be disposed of according to her sovereign will and pleasure. It is certain from the above that our agent at Geneva had never conceived this iniquity. Mr. Seward, in his communications, Mr. Adams, in his communications, the counsel of the Government in theirs, all speak of these claims as belonging to individuals. Even in the letter of Mr. Fish in which he enjoins upon the counsel of the Government to ask that the award shall be made in a gross sum, he recognizes just as emphatically the claims of the parties who had lost their property, the value of which might be included in the award. In his letter addressed to our counsel at Geneva he says:

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments; and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure if possible the award of a sum in gross.

Why a sum in gross? Gentlemen say it was because the Government wanted to apportion it according to its discretion. But let us see if that was the reason assigned by Mr. Fish himself. Let him speak. Mr. Fish goes on to say:

> In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims upon some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the case of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold herself free to decide as to the rights of the claimants—insurers—upon the termination of the case.

Why did she so wish; that she herself might confiscate the property; that she might give to those whose claims were rejected, and who never had any claims? No such monstrous claim as that was avowed, but only that she might be free to decide as to the respective rights of the claimants when they might conflict. He sets up no claim for the Government, but expressly recognizes the respective rights of the claimants. And yet, strange as it may seem, this very extract from Mr. Fish's instructions to our agent at Geneva is quoted and relied upon by each of the honorable gentlemen from Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, in defense of the Government's right to the disposition of this award. Such is the reason given by Mr. Fish why the Government wanted a sum in gross awarded, that the Government might do justice between the insured and the insurers, between the respective claimants who were to receive. Yet this is quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS,] as well as by others, to show that the Government insisted upon a sum in gross in order that it might dispose of the sum awarded as it thought proper. Yet the reason given by Mr. Fish is that the Government might do justice in this case between the insurers and the insured. Can anything be more clear or more conclusive? Does Mr. Fish anywhere intimate that the sum awarded was to be distributed to those whose claims were rejected? Did any officer of the Government ever hint at anything so monstrous?

There is not a single step in this case, not a single letter or a line written by any one, from the day Mr. Seward first sent his circular around the country to have these claims presented down to the day when the award was made and the money paid over to this Government, which even squints at disallowing and not paying to the several claimants their damages, if allowed and awarded by these arbitrators. The whole argument is based on some obscure figment of law, or on some uncertain, inconclusive word or phrase, like those cited and commented on by the gentleman from Iowa. There is nothing that I have read from Mr. Fish or from the argument of the counsel of this Government at Geneva which looks to any other disposition of this property than the one provided for by the report of the minority of this committee. That report is the embodiment of common sense and common justice. It is put together like a well-constructed frame, with no superfluous timbers and no deficiencies. It stands to this day unanswered, and I pronounce it unanswerable.

And I say further and without fear of contradiction that the Government from its organization down to this day has never made a treaty to secure the claims of our citizens upon any foreign country where the money which has been received (no matter in what form or under what circumstances it has been received) has not gone to compensate the damages which it was the object of the treaty to secure and for the payment of which it was received. No officer of this Government has ever set up the pretense that any one else had the right to the money except those whose property was destroyed and paid for. No one has ever set up the pretense that the Government had one particle of interest in any money received in consequence of damages sustained by our citizens. That idea originated here. What is there peculiar in the present state of facts that gives the Government any such right? The Government has lost nothing. The Government had no claim. She had but a mere figment of a claim to begin with; and after that claim was disallowed, as it was without argument, Mr. Fish said in so many words that he never wished and never expected anything to be awarded to the Government in consequence of any claim which she had. This is his very language:

> Neither the Government of the United States, nor, so far as I can hear, any considerable number of the American people, have ever attached much importance to the indirect claims, or have expected or desired any award of damages on their account.

The claims of the Government were a mere pretense. They were put forth for the sole purpose of procuring a decision of that learned and dignified tribunal on questions of international law of great importance to this country. That is all they were introduced for, not on the ground that the Government had any claim. I think you may examine the papers down to the close of this entire business before the arbitrators and you will not find a pretense set up anywhere—not a line or a word—that shows the Government ever thought of maintaining that these claims or any part of them should be disposed of in any other manner than according to the terms of the award and the just rights of the respective parties.

The honorable gentleman from Iowa dwelt very strongly on the point to which I alluded before, that inasmuch as this award was in full satisfaction of all the claims presented to the board, therefore all the claims ought to receive some portion of the money. That is a non sequitur. It is a most extraordinary proposition, that claims which were presented there and which our own arbitrator decided were no claims against Great Britain, any more than they were against France or Spain, must be paid out of an award made for claims allowed. The honorable gentleman from Iowa is a lawyer; he has brought suits a hundred times under the laws in regard to accounts; he doubtless has brought suits in which he recovered for one-half of the items of the account and on the other half failed to recover for the reason that one-half of the items in his bill were not good and valid claims against the defendant. I would like to inquire of the honorable gentleman whether those claims were not all of them and every single item in his bill equally satisfied; whether the claims disallowed were not just as much satisfied as the claims which were allowed? Is there any reason, therefore, why these claims which did not exist as a claim against Great Britain, which were not recognized but were rejected, should not be satisfied by the award?

Mr. Speaker, I do not know but I have noticed all the points which have been made in this case. I have intended to omit nothing which was even plausible. I have read no authorities to show that the underwriters were subrogated to the rights of the original owners. It has not been seriously questioned. It was admitted by the counsel of Great Britain in their counter-case; is laid down by Judge Story, in Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Peters. Affirmed by Daniel Webster. and may be found in all the elementary works. I wish to say, however, before I sit down that in my judgment this is the very last tribunal which should have been selected, or which any gentleman on this floor would ever select, for the purpose of deciding a question of this magnitude and intricacy. I say "intricacy," because although to me the question seems simple and plain, although it seems to me that no gentleman can read that award or read the report of the minority of this committee without coming to the same conclusion as myself, it is evident that very intelligent gentlemen do come to different conclusions; and it is evident also that scarcely any two persons on this floor, except the members of the committee, come to the same conclusion. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has come to an entirely different conclusion from any of the three reports coming from the committee. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] came to another entirely different conclusion. I understand that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WARREN,] who is next to address the House has come to another and substantially a different one still. Now, I submit to gentlemen on this floor whether this tribunal, where one-half at least of the members cannot have time to examine the case, and where other large numbers will not, is one to which they would be willing to submit a case of this kind if they owned a vessel the title to which or the pay for which depended on the vote of this House.

Mr. Speaker, this is a question, if there ever was one, that should go before a court. It should go to a body that can examine all the questions raised and all this testimony with great care, with abundant knowledge and capacity, and with due time for the fullest deliberation; a tribunal which is not appealed to on behalf of the poor, a tribunal where the appeal is not made to prejudices against the rich. It should go to a court that is unbiased by any such appeals, that is accustomed to judge of great questions of law and equity, and should there be decided as all other questions of this kind are, simply upon its intrinsic merits. I hope some gentleman on this floor will bring in a bill to that effect, taking this case out of the jurisdiction of this House and putting it in the hands of persons competent to decide it and to do justice and equity to all the parties interested in this great fund.

Such a bill would remove this subject from the jurisdiction of a tribunal most unfitted for its examination and remove it to another where sympathy and prejudice never enter, and where law, equity, and justice are meted out in equal measure both to the rich and to the poor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, nothing short of a seven-months residence in Washington could give one the assurance necessary to bring him to speak in this House at this late day on the subject of the Geneva award. Yet notwithstanding it has been discussed both in this and the last Congress by some of the ablest lawyers of both bodies, and apparently exposed from every point of view, I venture to attempt a restatement of what seem to me the considerations which should govern our vote. I do this without any expectation of adding anything new to the argument, but because the discussion of the subject has been extended over many months and the points of difference, however well expressed, cannot be kept in mind as they would be in the case of a continuous discussion.

The concluding remark of the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat, [Mr. LEAVENWORTH,] if I heard it correctly, indicates to my mind the question which underlies this whole discussion. He observed, if I heard him rightly, that this is not the proper place for the discussion and settlement of this question, that it should be remitted to the courts, and should be there decided as a question of legal right. Now, if I understand this question at all, that suggestion indicates precisely the point of divergence between the different parties to this controversy. On the one hand, the underwriters come in here and say that they have a legal, or, as I might term it, a quasi-legal, right in the fund which was recovered from Great Britain. I say a quasi-legal claim, rather than a legal claim, because I do full justice to the line of argument which, while admitting that a citizen cannot have a claim upon a foreign government which he can enforce in a court, yet may have a claim which his government is bound to prosecute, so to speak, on his behalf.

Now, the line of argument assumed on behalf of the underwriters commences with this proposition: That the owners of the vessels destroyed by the Alabama and the other cruisers, the inculpated cruisers so called, had, upon the destruction of their vessels, and by reason of the destruction of their vessels, claims upon Great Britain. They had claims which they owned, claims which could be assigned. They go further, and say that the United States intervened in behalf of its citizens, those citizens being the owners of those claims, and as attorneys or claim-agents presented the claims to the government of Great Britain; that by the process of the arbitration those claims were recovered; that the United States received this fund, but received it simply as agents or attorneys, or (to use the language of the discussion) as trustees for the owners of these vessels, and were bound to pay it to them. Then recourse is had to the dictum of subrogation, by virtue of which it is claimed that the underwriters, having paid the owners of the vessels the value of the vessels, as in case of a total loss, have the right of those owners in that fund. That is the argument from the beginning to the end of it. And it will be seen that it rests upon this simple proposition, that the owners of the vessels destroyed had a claim upon the government of Great Britain; a claim which could be enforced were there any tribunal in existence before which a foreigner could sue a sovereign state.

Now let us see what the proposition of international law is which these owners and those claiming through them must establish in order to make good their position. It is simply this: That in case of a war between two belligerents, the citizen of one belligerent nation being the owner of a vessel captured by a ship of war of the other belligerent has a valid claim, arising out of the destruction of that vessel and originating in such destruction, upon any neutral nation which in violation of neutral obligations had aided and abetted the belligerent whose cruiser destroyed that vessel. But I venture to say that no nation ever did or ever would admit the validity of any such claim on behalf of a citizen of a foreign government, and that no case can be found anywhere where such a proposition has been entertained by any court. It is important in this connection to remember that we hope and expect that whenever this or similar questions shall hereafter arise the United States will occupy the position, and claim the rights, and be subject to the obligations of a neutral, and not those of a belligerent.

Now I am aware that in a certain class of cases it is true that where a neutral government has established neutrality acts, regulating the duties of its citizens toward belligerents and prescribing what might be lawfully done by belligerents within its territory, in such cases where a vessel of war had been fitted up in violation of those neutrality acts, and subsequently by some chance a ship captured by such vessel had come within the jurisdiction of the neutral nation, in that event the courts of the neutral nation might intervene to restore the particular vessel so captured to the person claiming it as the owner. And if the vessel making the capture, having been fitted out in violation of such neutrality laws, which are municipal laws and no part of the law of nations, should come within the jurisdiction of the neutral nation in violation of whose laws she was fitted out, perhaps such neutral nation might confiscate the vessel itself. But there is no instance where a neutral nation has gone further and has compensated in damages the owner of the captured vessel, whether compensation was claimed on the ground that such vessel was captured by a belligerent cruiser fitted out in violation of their neutrality laws or on the ground that the capture was made within the jurisdiction of the neutral nation.

I mention these two subjects in connection, for I take it the principle on which a nation would be bound to enforce, so far as within its power, an observance of its own neutrality acts, both by its own citizens and by strangers within its borders, is nothing more nor less than the assertion of its own sovereignty within those borders, and is the same principle which requires belligerents to regard the paramount authority of a neutral nation within its own waters.

Nor is there any proof that in the negotiation of this treaty either the United States or the English government has recognized the right of the owner of the vessel to make a claim against Great Britain. Great Britain especially refused to recognize that right, and refused in the course of the correspondence for a long time even to submit to arbitration the question of her liability to the United States for violation of neutral obligations. What I refer to will be found in the reply of Lord Clarendon to Mr. Adams. Nor did the United States ever pretend that it prosecuted this claim as the agent of its injured citizens.

The whole theory of the negotiation of the treaty, the whole theory of the demand made by the United States from the beginning up to the time of the final negotiation of the treaty, was that Great Britain had violated her neutral obligations to this Government, and that by virtue thereof claims had arisen in behalf of the United States which Great Britain was bound to adjust, and a separate claim in favor of this Government was created whenever any confederate cruiser was built or equipped or manned and sent to sea by the aid or connivance of Great Britain in violation of such neutral obligations. We have been told, and it is constantly repeated, that in the course of the proceedings before the arbitration there was constant allusion to the claims made, and that in so alluding to them the amount of the claims was fixed by referring to the vessels that were destroyed. Well, sir, that is undoubtedly true; but, let me observe, the question I am now discussing is not what was the measure of damages. The question is when and where and how did the claims arise. The proposition which I believe cannot be gainsaid is, that the whole gist and substance of the demand of the United States upon Great Britain depended upon the fact that Great Britain had violated her obligations as a neutral nation.

I will not repeat, what has been repeated so often, the circumstances of this violation. They were different in the case of each of what are styled the inculpated cruisers. But in each case we alleged and Great Britain denied that she had failed to do her duty as a neutral. We claimed that from such violation we had a right to indemnity as well as apology, and she admitted that if she had failed to perform her neutral duties such apology was our due, and the proper indemnity she would make. And the question referred to the tribunal of arbitration was, first, whether she had violated her neutral duties; if yea, whether in one or two or more instances, and what was the amount of indemnity which the United States could claim.

Any other theory, particularly the theory of the underwriters, leads to this absurdity: They say Great Britain was liable in a vague equity, not legally, to individual claimants. But individual claimants suffered no loss until their vessels were destroyed. Then if they had a claim it arose from the consequences of the illegal conduct of Great Britain. The violation of her neutral duties, you must say, did not give this country a claim against her, but a consequence of such violation gave one of our citizens a claim which the nation prosecuted as his agent or attorney. Again, negligence when it furnishes a ground for a claim is to be treated as an act, an act of omission it may be. Now, as to whom was the act of negligence committed when Great Britain aided and abetted the confederates; against our citizens or against us as a nation? The question suggests its own answer. I shall have occasion to show hereafter that the acts of the confederate cruisers in destroying our merchant-vessels were not directed against any private rights of property in these vessels, but was in the exercise of what is recognized in international law as legitimate warfare against our nation. A fortiori, a neutral nation, even supposing it gave aid to one belligerent with malice aforethought, could not be held to contemplate as a result of its action anything more than the consequences to the other belligerent. It could not suppose that its aid was to be availed of to affect private rights of property except, of course, so far as they might be involved in the consequences of a warfare legitimately conducted.

The arbitration was then the method which was adopted to obtain the redress which in former times would have been sought by reprisal or by war. I am not going through the history of the arbitration. I know that if attention be directed to some observations of the arbitrators or the counsel much confusion can be thrown over the scope and purpose of the whole proceeding; but if gentlemen will turn to the award they will find one controlling circumstance which confirms the view I take, and that is that in every instance where great Britain was held to liability the tribunal rested its decision upon the ground that in the case of each inculpated cruiser there had been a failure in the performance of neutral obligations as laid down under the terms of one or another of the three rules fixed by the treaty as the rules of international law applicable to this case.

If then there is no authority for the position that the negligence of Great Britain in permitting the Alabama, for example, to be built and equipped in or from her ports would give a claim against that nation to a citizen of this country whose vessel might happen afterward to be captured by the Alabama, then all the rest of the argument in behalf of the underwriters falls to the ground. If no such claim existed the United States did not intervene as the agent to prosecute certain private claims, the money was not received in trust for any class of claims, and all talk of subrogation is idle. Subrogation is predicable of rights. The right must have arisen on the destruction of the vessel and on account of such destruction. But that destruction was by a confederate cruiser, in the exercise of legitimate warfare. Whatever crime Great Britain had committed had been committed long before, was a crime against the United States, was complete when the Alabama set out on her cruise, had no reference to any particular person or particular vessel in the United States, and was not altered in its character or magnitude by the number or value of the vessels destroyed.

And this leads me to refer to the argument so well presented the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He stated clearly the distinction between legal and illegal capture. In the one case, that of legal capture, all rights of property are divested. In the other case, that of illegal capture, they continue. Now, in the case in question, when the confederacy had been recognized by neutral powers and treated by our own Government as a belligerent, then captures of American vessels by war ships of the confederacy were legal captures. When once made, all property of the ship-owner in the captured vessel ceased. If the vessel continued to exist it became the property of the confederate government. If destroyed there was no property in the thing and no claim for its destruction remained. I may admit that ordinarily the duty of the captor is to take the prize into a port of his own country and have it condemned, but this duty ceases in case its performance becomes impracticable. It has been questioned whether or not the confederate naval officers should have tried to run the blockade with their prizes; but I suppose most persons would agree that, considering the number of American vessels of war at sea and the difficulty of running the blockade in a sailing-vessel, the exigency was sufficient to take the captures out of the general rule and excuse their destruction. And indeed the law of prize does not properly extend to enemy's property. And the cases cited so often of the existence of the right of subrogation when vessels have been captured are all cases of illegal capture, where, if the master had done his duty, he would have followed the ship to the port and prize court of the captor, and that court would have restored him the property. But who ever heard of a ship-master or ship-owner, whose vessel had been captured by the enemy's ship of war, seeking in the prize court of that enemy to question the legality of the capture?

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me to move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. WARREN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOPKINS. I hope the gentleman from California will withdraw that motion for a moment to allow me to offer a resolution that ought to precede it.

SESSION OF CONGRESS IN INDEPENDENCE HALL.

Mr. PAGE. Very well; I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer in behalf of the Committee on the Centennial Celebration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the two Houses of Congress will meet in joint convention in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on July 4, at nine o'clock a. m., for the purpose of passing proper resolutions commemorative of the great event which in that hall one hundred years ago brought this nation into being.

When the resolution offered by the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] was discussed on yesterday, I stated that we had received no invitation, and that it was uncertain whether we could have possession of Independence Hall on that day. I now ask the Clerk to read the telegram which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, July 2, 1876.

Hon. JAS. HOPKINS, Chairman, Washington, D. C.

I am requested by the authorities to invite you to meet at nine o'clock July 4 in Independence Hall. A special session of Congress in that hallowed place at such a time will be of deep interest to the whole world.

JNO. WANAMAKER,
Chairman of Joint Committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not desire to discuss the resolution so as to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts further than necessary, and therefore I will call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it should be a concurrent resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to make it such.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a pretty serious matter of constitutional power, and he has considered the question, whether without any law approved by the President the two Houses can adjourn to a place beyond the limits of the Federal seat of Government?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will make it a joint resolution, so that it will require the approval of the President. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits it. The meeting is not to be for legislative duties.

Mr. HALE. There should be no doubt about this being a joint resolution, because that is clearly necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will put the resolution in proper form.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) was then read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ask a question; it is whether we will have the right in Philadelphia to discuss and consider appropriation bills?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not think it fair to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] to longer interrupt him in his speech; and therefore I insist on the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 17.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. PAGE. I hope, as this resolution was introduced by the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WARREN,] who holds the floor, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] will withdraw it, the point having been made that no quorum has voted on the call for the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. It certainly seems to me that this is one of the gravest questions ever submitted to Congress, the question of the legality of this proceeding. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] will inform us upon that point. I do not want to object to the joint resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. The House is dividing on seconding the previous question, I believe.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. WHITE were appointed.

Mr. PAGE. I insist that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] has the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts yielded for the introduction of this joint resolution, and the House is now dividing upon seconding the previous question upon it.

Mr. PAGE. Cannot the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has not indicated any disposition to do so; the joint resolution is now before the House and the tellers will take their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 99, noes 18.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I still insist upon the objection that there is no quorum voting.

Mr. WHITE. This is a very serious matter. I am not a constitutional lawyer——

Mr. PAGE. I object to debate.

Mr. WHITE. We may be violating——

Mr. PAGE. I insist upon my objection to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The tellers will resume their places, as the Chair understands there are members in the House who have not yet voted.

The tellers resumed their places and continued the count, and after a time reported that there were—ayes 113, noes 23.

No further count being called for, the previous question was seconded and the main question was then ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] to yield to me to offer a resolution in relation to an adjournment over the Fourth of July.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think I can yield further, for it is probable the resolution will require the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think it will require that, and if it provokes any discussion I will withdraw it.

Mr. WARREN. Then I will yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns to-day it will stand adjourned until Wednesday next, the 5th day of July, saving the session in joint convention at Independence Hall on the 4th day of July, provided the same shall be ordered by the two Houses of Congress

Mr. SPRINGER. On that resolution I call for the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 33.

Mr. BELL. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints as such the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. PAGE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois what his resolution means?

Mr. SPRINGER. The House has already passed a joint resolution providing for the meeting of Congress in joint convention in Philadelphia on the 4th day of July. That joint resolution does not provide that Congress shall again re-assemble here. The resolution I have offered provides that Congress shall re-assmble here on the 5th of July.

Mr. WARREN. I must ask the gentleman not to interrupt me further.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am under obligation to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WARREN] to withdraw this resolution if there is any opposition to it. I therefore withdraw it.

FOURTH OF JULY—WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as a committee to attend the celebration of the Fourth of July, at twelve o'clock m., at Ford's Opera House, by invitation of the Oldest Inhabitants' Association of the District of Columbia, the following:

Mr. TUCKER of Virginia, Mr. HURLBUT of Illinois, Mr. CULBERSON of Texas, Mr. LANE of Oregon, Mr. CUTLER of New Jersey, Mr. SEELYE of Massachusetts, Mr. TOWNSEND of New York, Mr. O'BRIEN of Maryland, Mr. ROBBINS of North Carolina, Mr. WHITTHORNE of Tennessee, Mr. HALE of Maine, Mr. OLIVER of Iowa, and Mr. GARFIELD of Ohio.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

Mr. WARREN. When interrupted, I had stated the proposition that, there being nothing to which the right of subrogation could attach, it would of course be absurd to say that any such right longer existed. But the objection all through the discussion has been that the claims appear to have been recognized as individual claims, and the award, it is said, was made up by the enumeration of the different claims of the various owners. I think this mode of statement gives the most plausible support to the view of the underwriters. But the trouble with it is that it involves an ambiguous use of the word "claim." Now, it is undoubtedly true that the value of every vessel destroyed was taken into consideration by the tribunal; but it was for the simple purpose of fixing the amount of the award. It was never considered of any consequence who the owner of the vessel was. The tribunal took the evidence of the owners as to the value of the ships and the cargoes; they took the evidence of the insurance companies as to the amount of the insurance; but they took pains that the same item did not go twice into the consideration of the total amount of the award. And if you look carefully at the claims on behalf of the Government which were excluded from consideration by the tribunal and seek the ground of their rejection, you will find that the board of arbitrators set forth that those claims rejected did not, upon principles of international law applicable in such cases, "constitute a good foundation for an award of compensation or for computation of damages."

Now, everybody familiar with the matter of award of compensation knows that the phrase is used here as practically equivalent to the second phrase used, "computation of damages," the award being the aggregate of all the various matters of damage which are proved. But he would be a very poor lawyer indeed who should confuse the items which went to make up the gross amount of damage with that which formed the ground of the claim for which the damage was given. The distinction comes right here: The claim against Great Britain was a claim on behalf of our Government for an injury inflicted by the violation on the part of Great Britain of its duties as a neutral; but the award was made up by a computation of all the damages which could be traced directly to those cruisers which went from British ports by the aid or connivance of the British government; and the claims which were rejected were rejected because upon familiar principles governing the law of the computation damages they could not be traced directly to anything of which the British government itself was guilty, or were of such a vague and indefinite character that they could not be accurately measured in money.

If, then, there is no legal claim on the part of the owner of the vessel to recompense directly from Great Britain and no duty on behalf of the United States to act as a claim agent for such owner, what other theory is there which may govern the distribution of the award? Simply this: that the distribution is to be carried out, not as a matter of legal obligation on the part of the Government, but in the light of a moral obligation which the Government assumes to its own citizens. Before passing to this question I want to say that I think one difficulty on this subject has arisen from the confusion of two classes of obligations: one the international obligations which a neutral is bound to observe toward each of two belligerents; the other, the obligation which every belligerent assumes toward its citizens whose property is destroyed in time of war. Now, this latter class of obligations is the one to which we must look in the further distribution of this award. It is not necessary to go into the whole theory of the obligation of the Federal Government to its own citizens for losses incurred during the war. It is sufficient that I should call the attention of the House to the broad distinction between war carried on by land and war carried on by sea. It has been asked here in debate why, if the Government has a duty toward the owners of these vessels destroyed by confederate cruisers, has it not also a duty toward every loyal citizen whose property was destroyed in time of war? The answer is plain and simple; it rests upon the well-recognized principles of the laws of war. The destruction of private property on land is never legitimate, and in these modern days one belligerent never destroys the private property of a citizen of the other belligerent except in case of absolute necessity. So the loss of property on land is always to be treated as a loss occasioned by the exigency of war which the government cannot in the nature of things provide against and for which the citizen whose property is destroyed has no claim against his government. On sea the rule is entirely different. Upon the sea every merchant-vessel is a part of the territory of the belligerent under whose flag she sails. The other belligerent has a right to make war upon that vessel and upon every vessel bearing the flag of its enemy.

Now, this very fact that the capture of a merchant-vessel by the war-ship of a hostile government is legal because the war is legally waged upon that vessel, is the ground of the equitable claim of the owners of the vessels destroyed upon this Government. The fact that war may be legally waged upon the private merchant-vessels of a nation binds that nation to a corresponding obligation to defend and protect those vessels wherever they go on the high seas. In earlier times the illustrations of this in the books are very frequent. I refer to cases which turn on the question whether the merchantman had been guilty of negligence in failing to wait for convoy. The duty on the part of the government to furnish convoy was recognized, and the merchantman, on the other hand, was bound to enter upon a voyage so as, if possible, to have the safeguard of the convoy. History reminds us how often in former times whole fleets of merchantmen went out under the protection and convoy of ships of war. The duty of the Government toward its merchant marine still exists, because, however much the laws of war have been ameliorated in regard to the conduct of war by land, they remain as heretofore in regard to the conduct of war by sea. Therefore, when it failed to provide a proper convoy for its merchantmen, to offer or to take other proper means to protect its merchant-vessels against the attack of the confederate war-vessels the Government was guilty of neglect of duty, for which it was bound to compensate those of its citizens who suffered from such neglect. The proposition may be stated a little more broadly. While in naval wartare the blow falls upon particular vessels belonging to the merchant marine and the loss is sustained by individual owners, yet the war is really waged against the commerce of the country; and the justification for the rule which allows war by sea to be waged against private vessels is that by destroying its commerce the strength and ability of a country to prosecute a war is impaired.

This warfare, then, was waged by the confederate cruisers on the commerce of the United States, and it was because that war was waged on the commerce of the United States by the aid and assistance of Great Britain, to state it generally, that our claim against Great Britain arose. The sum we received from Great Britain was the tribute which she was obliged to pay us for the violation of her neutrality obligations in aiding this warfare on our commerce. Therefore, as she was compelled to provide compensation for the injury done to our commerce, the money received should be applied by our Government to making good the losses of our commerce which our Government failed to prevent.

Now let us see where in equity, there being no legal obligation, it should go. If the vessels destroyed were not insured and the loss fell on their owners, and their value was fully estimated in the aggregate of the award which was rendered, the distribution would be simple. The money would be payable to the ship-owners. If, in the second place, those ships and those alone had been insured and the insurers had paid the losses, there would in that case, I conceive, have been an equitable claim on the part of the insurers to step into the place of the insured. But if, in the third place, the insurance has been more than made good by men who had paid war premiums, then, on the same principle of equity, the war-premium men would be the men whose losses should be made good. In short, the fund should be applied to make good actual losses. The losses may be looked at as involuntary contributions toward keeping alive our commerce, and those involuntary contributions should be re-imbursed by the Government, whose failure to protect that commerce caused the losses.

But the question is complicated. It is complicated by the fact that the vessels destroyed by the inculpated cruisers were only partially insured; that the underwriters in some cases were re-imbursed by the war premium received, and in other cases were only partially re-imbursed; and that many other vessels were destroyed by cruisers not aided by Great Britain, but which were engaged in similar depredations on our commerce. And as to the vessels destroyed by these other cruisers, there was the same obligation of protection on the part of our Government that existed with reference to vessels destroyed by the Alabama.

And if all the losses traceable to the acts of the inculpated cruisers have been fully paid and a balance of the tribute money remains in the hands of our Government, the application of the rule which fixes this moral obligation of the Government would compel us to apply that balance to compensate the owners of the second class of vessels destroyed.

I do not mean to go over the bill in detail. I am satisfied on the whole with the bill of the majority with the amendments proposed by my friend from Pennsylvania. I simply state the equitable principle on which this amount should be distributed. I am satisfied that the majority bill conforms to the principle as I understand it.

The only other view taken is that instead of this money being paid in pursuance of this moral obligation it should be paid into the Treasury; because it is said that in the end the people of the whole country had to pay the losses of the war, and that whatever was got from England should be re-imbursed to the people of the whole country. I trust that what I have already stated as to the difference between warfare by sea and warfare by land, and the different rights of the citizens who venture by sea and those who simply own property on land, is sufficient to answer to this line of argument. And I will not undertake to elaborate it.

I will say in conclusion that I hope this question will awaken the interest of gentlemen who represent portions of the country remote from our commercial centers. I have seen how the subject has dragged here and how hard it has been to attract the general attention of members to it. But I cannot believe that a measure designed to do justice to the commerce of the country concerns the Northeastern States alone and does not equally affect the welfare of the rest of the country. If the people of a distant section of the country should come here for some measure of relief or for protection against a threatened aggression, it would not become a Representative from New York or New England to say "that does not concern me," and leave the Hall or vote against the measure on the ground that it involved, say, a small expenditure of money. If the people of Texas, for instance, ask the interposition of the Federal arm to defend their homes and flocks from the incursions of marauders, we from the East should and I trust we do give their request a patient hearing and vote with alacrity the needed means of defense. If Louisiana and the States of the Mississippi Valley show us that their internal navigation is hindered by the condition of their great rivers, that their lands are liable to inundation, and that the remedy can come from the Federal Government alone and is within its legitimate field of action, shall we vote against it because it is none of our concern? If the States of the western slope desire a closer connection with the Hawaiian Islands, shall we oppose their wishes because no benefit is to accrue to our remote section? I trust and believe that no one who hears me will permit himself to look at this or indeed at any public question from a narrow local stand-point. But if ever locality were to influence men's actions on this floor it should not be in their course on this question, for the commerce of the country has demands upon all sections. Whatever may be said of the vastness of our agricultural interests as the foundation of our national wealth, however earnestly men may insist that our manufactures are a special object of the fostering care of the Government, it will not be denied that both agriculture and the manufactures must recognize the claims of commerce, for it is commerce alone which gives value to their products. I speak only the familiar language of political economy when I remind gentlemen that with our vast productive capacity both of agricultural and manufactured products the profit of the producer depends upon the facility and cheapness with which he can dispose of his surplus. To restore our commercial prosperity, then, is not only a duty which this country owes to its merchants, it is the dictate of the selfish interest of every class of our people.

The neglect of the Government—I use the word in no harsh sense anywhere in these remarks; it was a neglect caused by the pressure of more urgent duties—the failure of the Government to protect our commerce during the war caused the almost entire destruction of our mercantile marine. Our commerce suffered a loss from which it has never, up to the present time, revived. But some compensation may be made to the innocent sufferers by the speedy distribution of this sum, which is indeed in the hands of the Government for no purpose but to make that compensation. In simple justice and equity, then, I ask all portions of the country and men of all classes and occupations to unite and pass the bill without further delay.

Mr. CAULFIELD obtained the floor.

DISTRICT TAX BILL.

Mr. NEAL. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes of the same upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2676, entitled "An act to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to said bill and agree thereto, amended as follows:

First. In section 1, line 9, after the word "the" insert the word "assessed."

Second. In section 4, lines 28 and 29, strike out the words "on such part or parcel of land as said tax relates to."

Third. Section 4, line 29, strike out the word "law" and insert the words "this act."

Fourth. Section 4, line 21, after the word "every" insert the word "secular."

Fifth. Section 7, line 12, after the word "accrue" insert the following words: "And for want of such goods and chattels, said collector may levy upon and sell at auction in like manner the estate and interest of such person, firm, association, or corporation in any parcel of land in said District, and in that case the proceedings as to such land subsequent to sale shall be the same as in the case of taxes against real estate, as in this act provided."

Sixth. Section 8, line 9, strike out the word "said" and insert the word "such."

Seventh. Section 8, lines 20, 21, and 22, strike out the words "the stock, so far as the individual owner is concerned, of any corporation which is taxed on its capital in said district, sixthly."

Eighth. Section 10, lines 40 to 45 inclusive, strike out the following words: "and the person so refusing shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, to which may be added imprisonment not exceeding thirty days."

Ninth. Section 10, lines 50 to 53 inclusive, strike out the following words: "and if the return provided for in this act shall not be made by any firm, each member thereof resident of said District shall be liable to the penalties of this act."

Tenth. Section 11, line 5, after the word "value" insert the words: "and the shares in the same shall not be assessed against the individual owners thereof."

Eleventh. Section 12, line 26, strike out the word "thereunder."

Twelfth. Section 12, insert at the end thereof the following words: "In case the assessors shall fail to complete any of the duties in this act to be by them performed within the times provided therefor, the taxation provided by this act shall not by reason thereof be invalid; but such assessors shall proceed with all reasonable diligence to complete such duties, and their acts shall be valid, as if performed within the times fixed therefor."

SEC. 19. Strike out the whole section and insert: "That the twenty-third section of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, entitled 'An act imposing a license on trades, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia,' approved August 23, 1871, clauses 20 and 35 of the twenty-first section of said act, and clause 16 of said twenty-first section of said act as amended by the act amendatory thereof approved June 20, 1872, and all other laws and acts, or parts thereof, inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

LAWRENCE T. NEAL,
JULIAN HARTRIDGE,
GEORGE WILLARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
T. J. ROBERTSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. What is the provision made in regard to assessments on real estate outside of the city?

Mr. NEAL. As the bill now comes back it is substantially the same, as far as the principle of taxation is concerned, as was originally passed. It imposes a tax upon all real and personal property, but as it now stands the rate of taxation is uniform throughout the District, whereas by the bill as originally passed there was a difference in the rate of taxation imposed in the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the rate outside of those cities. I would state that two of the members on the part of the House were opposed to this uniform rate of taxation, and in favor of making a difference in the rate between property in the two cities and in the country outside of the two cities, but we yielded to the judgment of some members of the committee for the sake of coming to an agreement. I ask that the report be concurred in, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT AND ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am ready to go on now if it is the desire of the House.

Mr. LORD. I hope the House will hear the last speech now about to be made by the gentleman from Illinois, who probably will not occupy more than twenty minutes, and after he is through I shall move the previous question and the House will then be ready to adjourn. [Cries of "Let us adjourn now."]

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE FOURTH OF JULY.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] yield to me to offer a resolution providing for an adjournment over the Fourth of July?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I send a resolution to the Clerk's desk which I ask may be adopted now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns to-day it will stand adjourned until Wednesday next, the 5th day of July, saving the session in joint convention in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on the 4th day of July: Provided, The same shall be ordered by the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman will substitute Monday at one o'clock p. m., and that the House will take a recess from to-day until ten o'clock on Monday. In the three hours of that day which that will give us we will be able to accomplish all that can be accomplished before the Fourth of July.

Many MEMBERS. There will be no quorum here then.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be a quorum enough for all the business we will have to do.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am willing to stay here now long enough to finish up what work we have do.

Mr. RANDALL. I must insist upon my resolution as I originally offered it, and I will call the previous question on it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must protest against the loss of next Monday in the present condition of business.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no such pressure of business as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seems desirous to picture. The appropriation bills, such as we can get hold of, are all in the hands of conference committees.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some of the others can be disposed of on Monday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I must insist upon the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to allow a vote on the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to amend the resolution so that it shall read: "When the House adjourns on Monday next at one o'clock p. m., it shall stand adjourned to meet on Wednesday," &c.

Mr. RANDALL. I will allow that amendment to be voted upon. I now call the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, providing for an adjournment from Monday, the 3d instant, at one o'clock p. m., until Wednesday, the 5th instant.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 29, noes 60.

Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. TOWNSEND of New York. There is no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 37, noes 73; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 16, noes 62.

So (one-fifth having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it be in order to move that the House now take a recess until Monday next, at ten o'clock a. m.?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion for a recess is in order, there being no motion to adjourn pending.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the House is now dividing on another question, upon which the last vote developed no quorum, and therefore the motion for a recess is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think the point of order is well taken. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the joint resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 76, not voting, 164; as follows:

Mr. NEW. My colleague, Mr. FULLER, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. CABELL. My colleague from Virginia, Judge HARRIS, is absent on account of indisposition.

Mr. HUBBELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. DURHAM. If he were present I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague from Ohio, Mr. VANCE, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BRADLEY. My colleague, Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS, left the Hall two hours ago on account of sickness.

At the conclusion of the roll-call,

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, said: I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order now to move that the House take a recess till ten o'clock on Monday morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of a quorum no motion is in order except to adjourn or for a call of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 597) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith; and

An act (H. R. No. 2691) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted

To Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, for two weeks from July 5;

To Mr. TEESE for one week from Monday next;

To Mr. FRANKLIN for twelve days from July 5;

To Mr. CATE indefinitely;

To Mr. METCALFE for ten days from July 4;

To Mr. FRYE for ten days;

To Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, for the 3d and 4th of July to attend to important business; and

To Mr. JOHN REILLY until July 6.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. INGALLS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. EATON.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 702) for changing the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3838) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave for withdrawal of papers was granted in the following cases, in which there had been no adverse report:

To Mr. McCRARY in the case of Mrs. Eleanor McGugin; and

To Mr. MACDOUGALL in the case of Frank A. Page.

BRIDGE ACROSS SYNEPUXENT BAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the bill (H. R. No. 3136) to authorize the Ocean City Bridge Company to maintain the bridge across Synepuxent Bay, in Worcester County, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSTON AND TEXAS RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relative to the claim of the Houston and Texas Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARRIS,] chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, that the other members of that committee are absent and may probably be absent during most of the remaining part of the session. The duties of that committee at this period of the session are very great, and of course a single member is unable to discharge them. The Chair therefore requests authority to appoint, as has been customary, two additional members to serve until the close of the session. If there be no objection, the Chair appoints as such additional members the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HARRISON, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. BAKER.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that before making a decision on that subject we should learn whether the Senate has adjourned from to-day until Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Senate was in executive session five minutes ago; and I presume is yet.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 29, noes 62.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock this evening. The object is to secure, if possible, final action on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that no business is in order except a motion for a call of the House or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. We have sent to the Senate to find out whether it has adjourned or not.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then let us wait till that fact is ascertained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that by taking a recess we will dispose of the post-office appropriation bill to-night. It is one of the most important bills of the session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will be allowed; that the bill will be passed; and then I have no doubt he will agree to the adjournment over.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not consent to losing two days of next week.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman knows he can do nothing on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the Senate has adjourned till Monday. I move that the House take a recess till ten o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order that the House is now dividing on another motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a necessity for taking a recess until ten o'clock on Monday, so that we may pass the post-office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing in order except a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House, the point having been made that a quorum is not present, which has been officially determined by the call of the roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that by unanimous consent the House will take a recess till ten o'clock on Monday. If that is done I think we can dispose of the post-office appropriation bill in half an hour.

Mr. KASSON. Why cannot we pass it this evening?

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House take a recess till eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. WHITE. I insist on my point of order that the House was dividing on a motion to adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 48, noes 44.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petition of George Conway, of Brooklyn, New York, late master and captain of the United States bark Voltiguer, for compensation for property lost by reason of the sinking of said bark in New York Harbor on the 22d of April 1865, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. The petition of the Brunswick and Albany Railroad Company, to be relieved from the 10 per cent. tax imposed on circulating notes issued by them, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FOURTH-OF-JULY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If in order, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I heard some Senator, or some person, suggest that it might be desirable to make the hour later on Wednesday.

Mr. CONKLING. Then we can take a recess to that hour, after we meet at noon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely made the suggestion because somebody had made it to me. I will not interfere with whatever the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations desires.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am satisfied it is quite desirable that we should meet at twelve o'clock on Wednesday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am satisfied, if the Senator thinks that is the right hour. Indeed, I was satisfied beforehand.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the motion by inserting "Thursday;" and I desire to state my reasons for it. The Fourth of July ought to be celebrated every year, and this year more than any other. Most members of Congress and most persons employed at the Capitol reside at some distance from Washington, and it would be quite impossible for them to find time, even leaving to-night, to avoid traveling on the Fourth of July in order to return in time, if the motion is adopted as it was first proposed. On the contrary, if we wait until Thursday, they can travel on Wednesday and reach here in time for the meeting on Thursday morning.

Mr. CONKLING. To whom, if I may inquire, does the Senator refer?

Mr. BAYARD. I move to insert "Thursday."

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator was speaking of Senators traveling on Wednesday. To what Senators does he refer; those who go home or those who go to Philadelphia?

Mr. BAYARD. I mean those who seek to get back from their homes. They may leave the city of Washington to-night; but it would be almost impossible for them to get here by midday on Wednesday, or at all on that day.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think many Senators desire to go home for the Fourth.

Mr. BAYARD. There are many whose homes are this side of New York, and I think it will have this result: It is a practical question, and the absence of a quorum will probably be disclosed on Wednesday early after the meeting, and then it will be impossible to go on with the ordinary work. I believe nothing will be lost as to time by adjourning until Thursday. I do not believe the Senate should pass a resolution adjourning until Wednesday at twelve o'clock. There will not be a quorum present on Wednesday, and the want of that quorum will be disclosed very early after the Senate meets on that day. If I am right as to that, then the adjournment might as well be made to Thursday, because those going away will then be able to get back here for the meeting of the Senate. I suggest this to the Senate because I desire to see the business of the body prosecuted.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the heat in Washington has become not only oppressive but dangerous. All appropriation bills except two or three are undisposed of. On Friday next, the 6th of this month, we have agreed, after efforts not less than three made on the one side and on the other to postpone it, to take up and proceed with the impeachment trial. This is Monday.

Mr. INGALLS. We proceed with the trial on Thursday.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator corrects me, and the case is stronger than I supposed. It is on Thursday, the 6th, which adds force to the objection I am going to state to the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware. Manifestly our duty is to conclude the public business deliberately but expeditiously, and adjourn this session of Congress, if we can. To-morrow is the Fourth of July, and I take it that no Senators whose homes are distant are going to leave Washington to-day to attend the Fourth of July at home and return.

It is well known that a number of Senators who are absent are absent now on excursions for to-day and to-morrow. They will be able, I think, to return so that we shall have a quorum on Wednesday. Certainly we ought to have a quorum then, for I can conceive no higher duty that any Senator owes than to be here now, considering the condition of the public business. If we meet on Wednesday at twelve o'clock, and there shall be no quorum, we may be driven by a recess to wait for a later hour, when a quorum can assemble. We have certainly no right to assume—I am sure the Senator from Delaware will not assume, as he is here himself—that any Senator will, for some passing, trifling cause, absent himself on Wednesday, knowing, as every Senator does, although I myself misstated the day, that on Thursday, at one o'clock, the trial of the impeachment of the late Secretary of War is to proceed.

It seems to me that the motion of the Senator from Maine is exactly right, that we observe the Fourth of July by adjourning over, giving any Senator who in that interval may have the occasion to participate in the observance of that day the opportunity to do so, but that we go on expeditiously with the public business; and I hope that that may occur on Wednesday.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state to the Senator that I am willing to withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says he is going to withdraw his motion. He will pardon me before he does that, for making one additional remark. I venture, as I am on my feet, to express the hope that on Wednesday that will occur which will remove the appropriation bills as a stumbling-block or a source of apprehension in the country at large; that in some way we shall make such advance on Wednesday as to see our way out of any difficulties which have attended the appropriation bills; and that we shall then be ready and able on Thursday to proceed with the impeachment trial and go through with it. Although the weather is hot and although the inconvenience is great, the Senate has several times refused to postpone that trial. In the mean time, it is matter of public notoriety that a summons has issued for a great number of witnesses, who will be entitled to their pay. We listened to an item inserted in one of the appropriation bills of $50,000 to defray the expenses of that trial. I venture, as one member of this body, to express the hope that when the hour arrives at which that trial is to proceed, it will proceed and go on to the end and be disposed of. I shall so vote, for one, upon all the lights that I have now. To the end that we may be able to do that, and to the end that we may acquit ourselves of the other duties which rest, and urgently rest, upon the two Houses, I think we should make the most of our time, adjourn for the Fourth of July, which is right, which is only a decorous deference paid to that day, but that when that day is over we shall make the best haste we can with deliberation, but with diligence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. On the suggestion of gentlemen better acquainted with the business of the body than myself, yielding to their views on the subject, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment being withdrawn, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present to the Senate a resolution and preamble adopted by the National Board of Trade at its session in the city of New York on June 29, 1876. They set forth the benefits which in their opinion are connected with what are called the fast-mail trains of the country, and they respectfully and very earnestly request that Congress shall adopt no system of legislation which will discontinue them, but rather that they shall be increased on other routes. I do not know that this is a subject to be referred now; it has been settled, I believe, against my earnest remonstrance in the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill. I move that this preamble and resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of George W. Graffam, late first lieutenant Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry, praying to be restored to his former rank and position in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL presented additional papers pertaining to the claim of D. B. Randall, for compensation for certain improvements made by him on lands lying within the Nez Percé Indian reservation in Idaho Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buc'ner, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, made in obedience to law, in relation to an act to set apart a portion of the island of Mackinac, in the straits of Mackinac, within the State of Michigan, as a national park, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, late major in the Fourth Michigan Cavalry, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2569) to revive the law and extend the time for filing claims for horses and equipments lost by officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) donating two cannon and carriages to the warden and burgesses of Stonington, Connecticut, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers, reported it without amendment, the committee adopting the report of the House committee.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 938) for the relief of George T. Olmsted, jr., reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of T. T. Garrard and others, praying compensation for the destruction of their salt, salt-wells, &c., in Clay County, Kentucky, by United States troops in 1862, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 969) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to state that as a minority of the Committee on Claims I dissent from the report of the majority of the committee just presented by the Senator from West Virginia, and I ask leave on Wednesday next to present the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Leave will be granted if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 970) for the relief of George W. Graffam, late first lieutenant in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 971) for the relief of D. B. Randall; which was read twice by its title, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPENCER. At the request of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, I ask leave to introduce a bill to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 972) authorizing the commissioners of the District to issue certificates in the case of loss or destruction of registered certificates or bonds of the District; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that involves the issue of bonds in place of other bonds outstanding, it ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance, because those are some of them Government bonds. Unless the Senator desires it to go to the District Committee, I would rather the bill should be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MCCREERY, it was Ordered, That Charles M. Briggs, executor, be allowed to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

ROBERT RANSOM.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia, to report it with an amendment, and as this matter has been delayed by an accident in the loss of a paper, I ask that the bill may be considered at this time. The committee report it favorably, with an amendment, to make it conform to the usual method of granting relief of this sort.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in line 4, to strike out the words "legal and," and in lines 4 and 5, the words "act of July 2, 1862, and the;" so as to read:

That all the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Robert Ransom, a citizen of the State of Virginia, late a captain in the United States Army, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to remove the political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia."

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS WITHIN KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. KELLY. The bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, was under consideration about a week ago and partly disposed of. I ask that it be now taken up. The bill has already been read and there is an amendment pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not call up that bill this morning. There are some papers containing information as to that bill, which I have been looking up, that I have not at my desk, and the Senate is very thin.

Mr. KELLY. I beg pardon of the Senator from Vermont. The Senate is quite as full, I think, as it will be at any time during the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My reason, as I have stated, is that it was evident the other day when we had this bill up that at the very best it would have to be corrected, for it bore on its face a manifest misstatement, to begin with, about certain new lands, if that is what they are called. On looking it up, although I have not the papers here present, it appears that that part of the question, at the very best, needs a good deal of consideration if the first part of it does not. Therefore, I was in hopes the Senator from Oregon would not press it this morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that, so far as I am concerned as one of the Senators from Oregon, I shall move to strike out all that part of the bill referring to new lands, and shall oppose the bill unless it is stricken out.

Mr. KELLY. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont that I am not opposed to that, although I think that clause ought to be in on account of the law I referred to the other day, yet I am going to make no opposition to striking it out. I will assent to his amendment or the amendment that may be offered by my colleague to that effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not reach the point; but I do not see why the Senator should be so very eager to take up the bill this identical morning. Of course I can go and get the papers if somebody will discuss it long enough to enable me to find my memoranda.

Mr. KELLY. I will not press it to a conclusion until the Senator returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks for the present consideration of the bill. The question is on the motion to take the bill from the Calendar for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in line 12, after the word "mineral," to insert "and which are then subject to entry under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that ought to be "homestead or pre-emption."

Mr. KELLY. Yes, it would be better to have it in that form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that amendment is proper, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that if he wants to go to his committee-room to get papers he can do it. I should like to hear him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did want to go, but I do not seem to have any time, and I think I can make considerable of an explanation of this bill with what I have got.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought I would occupy the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is very kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to occupy the Senator's time, but I will occupy the time until the Senator comes back if he really wants to go and get his papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I was in doubt about this bill when it was up. I want to hear it discussed.

Mr. KELLY. I call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there is a dispute about occupying the time, I could occupy two minutes of it with an explanation. I do not wish to interfere with the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. A personal explanation?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not a personal explanation, but an official explanation.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the bill read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said to the Senator from Oregon what I repeat to the Senate on some little knowledge which I acquired a long time ago that, if I were a Senator from Oregon, speaking as a Senator from Oregon, I certainly would not be willing to allow floats, as they are called, scrip to be issued which may be located anywhere. Some of the greatest disputes that have occurred in our country have grown out of the location of floats on land of great value, sometimes on military reservations after they have been abandoned, and the question arose as to whether such land was public land subject to entry or not. Disputes of that kind arose in Kansas, in Iowa, and in many other States. It seems to me very unwise and against public policy in any State to allow floats to be located on public lands in that State.

This amendment of mine was intended to limit it somewhat so that the scrip could only be located on land subject to pre-emption or homestead. But take the case of a military reservation; take the extreme case of Fort Leavenworth, where the land is very valuable. It has been long occupied by Government as a Government reservation, but it has now ceased to be important as a public reservation, and it is really public land open to sale. It may be that one of these floats, without some careful provision, might be located there. It cannot now be under this bill, but when it is abandoned as a military reservation it should not be liable to such a thing. Twenty years ago we had a very interesting controversy about Fort Snelling in Minnesota, and cases of that kind have arisen several times in the history of this Government. They arose early in Ohio, where there was a controversy about entries on public land, but this is so amended as to limit that, and I think there is no objection to that limitation. Even then it is against public policy to allow these floats, which may be set down upon public land. There is one of them located in this city on Kidwell's Meadows. Sioux scrip, if I am not mistaken, is located on what is claimed to be public land, riparian land belonging to the United States of America in this city. The claim to what are called Kidwell's Meadows arises, as I understand, from the location of floating scrip. I see, however, that this bill is so framed as to confine the location of this scrip to the State of Oregon, and the amendment as now offered confines it to lands subject to pre-emption and homestead; but even then there is great danger of abuse growing out of the authority given to issue scrip which may be located on public land at any time hereafter.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, on the 2d of July, 1864, Congress granted to the State of Oregon a quantity of land from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State, three sections on each side of a road extending between those points, for the purpose of building a road over a stretch of country to which there was no means of access. The road was built by a number of gentlemen who formed a company, to which the State of Oregon transferred the grant, coupled with certain conditions that they were to construct the road in a certain way and in accordance with the provisions of the law of Congress of 1864. The road was built at an expense of between $200,000 and $300,000. After the grant and after the construction of the road an Indian reservation was established, known as the Klamath Indian reservation, and it included the very best portion of the grant made to the company. When the company was about to take possession of its lands the Indians threatened disturbance; threatened that they would use force to expel any person that should come upon the reservation. Mr. Dyar, the Indian agent, begged that the company would desist from making any claim to the lands, stating that if they did so his life would not be worth anything to him; he could not stay there twelve hours if any attempt was made. At his earnest solicitation the company desisted from asserting its rights, trusting that Congress would indemnify it for the lands it was entitled to, and which it had received a patent for, amounting to about one hundred thousand acres within that reservation. This was in 1873, and at the next session of Congress application was made for indemnity; that is, for the payment of the value of these lands that had been earned by the company and that had been patented to it by the Land Office. It was deemed inadvisable at that time to pay the value, but it was suggested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that lands might be given in lieu of those that the company had instead of money. Although that was distasteful to the company; although they claimed and asserted their rights; and although they had been paying taxes on these lands and had actually paid some $7,500 in taxes during several years, notwithstanding they were unable to get possession of them, it was with great reluctance that they acceded to this proposition of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. This bill was introduced into the House of Representatives, passed there, and that body deemed it advisable to give the company lands in lieu of those within the reservation, to be selected at any place within the State of Oregon. They desired that they might make the selection elsewhere; but it was thought prudent to confine them to Oregon, and so it was done.

This is a statement of the rights of the company and of the way in which they have been misused; because I must say it is nothing less than that. They have been wronged. They have built this road on the pledge and on the faith that the United States would give them the lands; and when the road was made that faith was violated by giving their lands for an Indian reservation, and setting apart for the Indians after the company were entitled to them. I think that is a great wrong to the company, and the least that can be done is to give lands in lieu of them, and thus do something in the nature of equity to the company that built this road over which Indian supplies are taken to this very reservation. They had no road to it before this, no means of access to it, and this very road that has been built enables them to get their supplies to the Indian reservation, enables the employés of the reservation to travel to and from it; and now the company simply ask that they may get lands in lieu of those thus taken from them, and I think the least that can be done is to pass this bill.

So far as the bill is concerned, I think it is right and proper to guard it, and it has been guarded, by saying that the selection shall be from lands subject to homestead or pre-emption entry; but I will state here that any land may be taken in Oregon for a pre-emption or homestead, whether surveyed or unsurveyed. This is by virtue of the law of 1854, which has been extended to Oregon and Washington Territory. So, if this bill be amended as has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, it will simply conform to what is now the pre-emption and homestead system in Oregon, and enable them to take lands anywhere in that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I was quite desirous that the Senate should be full when this matter should be considered, because it is one of a great many cases that under the laws of the United States must inevitably arise from time to time under grants that have already been made, and it is therefore of a good deal wider importance as a precedent than this single question about one or two hundred thousand acres of land is. And from the examination that I have made of it, I am persuaded that, to say the least, it is extremely doubtful whether the gentlemen who make this claim have any just claim upon the United States at all. If the Supreme Court of the United States holds on to the spirit and letter of what I understand it already to have decided, then it will turn out that this present grant of scrip that we are called upon to make is an absolute gratuity, and that the people who claim it have no right to have any indemnity in respect of what has transpired at all.

But the Senate is very thin. However we must go on. If Senators care enough about it to give their attention, I should like to state briefly from the report and from the statute just the order of events. In the first place came the statute of the 2d of July, 1864, which says:

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Eugene City, by way of middle fork of Willamette River, and the most feasible pass in Cascade range of mountains, near Diamond Peak, to the eastern boundary of the State, alternate sections of public lands—designated by odd numbers, for three sections in width on each side of said road.

Mark the phrase, "public lands"—

Then follows a proviso:

That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied in the construction of said road.

And then further:

That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by act of Congress or other competent authority be, and the same are, reserved from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be necessary to locate the route of said road through the same, in which case the right of way is granted.

Then the other sections provide that the lands shall be disposed of by the Legislature "for the purpose aforesaid," and that "the road shall be and remain a public highway for the free use of the United States." Then it provides that the lands shall only be issued as the road is built from time to time, thirty sections at a time for each continuous ten miles, and so on; and if the road is not completed within five years, no further sales shall be made.

The Senate will observe two things on the face of the act. First, it is a grant of public lands, not of any territory that the United States may own, but of what in our system of statutes are known as the public lands of the United States; and on that I say that the Supreme Court has come very near deciding, if it has not actually so decided—and in effect it has so decided, although I have not the decisions here at hand, and nobody would be interested to go over them if I had—that what is meant by the term "public lands" in such grants that are taken most strongly against the grantee and most strongly in favor of the United States is those public lands that have fallen under survey and are the subject of disposition to parties already. Secondly, you will perceive that this section provides that "all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or other competent authority," are excepted from the grant. That says "heretofore." Applied to the date of the act, of course any reserved lands afterward would not fall in respect of the grant; but the Supreme Court has decided, and correctly, over and over again that where a grant of this character is afloat, and until it is located and laid down is anywhere they happen to make the road within general boundaries that are named, gives no right that attaches to any definite section or any definite parcel of land; and therefore if before the line of railway or highway is located the United States have made any disposition of their public lands within that region that the location then covers, the location does not take up the lands that the United States meantime have disposed of or reserved. If you should hold otherwise, the result would be on one of these floating grants that the United States would be absolutely powerless to do anything with any part of its public lands until the road should be located, for the reason that it might be that they were selling lands already granted, because you cannot tell where the line of the road is to be located within the general direction that the statute lays down. So I believe the law to be perfectly clear that where the word "heretofore" is used in a statute granting lands, as it is in this one, which are not defined by metes and bounds or sections, but by which there is an open grant according to a general line of a road, railroad or other, that may be laid down, and before that line is laid down the United States shall have sold or a homestead or pre-emption claim shall have been filed, or the United States shall have reserved the land for some other purpose, then the grant, so far as that land is concerned, never operates at all. It ought not to operate, because, as I have said, otherwise the hands of the United States would be tied all the time. They could not dispose of any land until the line should be located anywhere in the neighborhood, for the reason that they could not tell but that the line would go over that very land, and then the title would be ousted and there would be trouble. So I believe the law to be established, as it is wise it should have been, that where an open grant of this character is made, and a reservation is made, and lands that heretofore may have been reserved for any use of the United States or sold, the word "heretofore" is applied to the time when the grant actually operates upon the piece of land, and not to the date of the act.

That being the state of the law—and I feel quite confident that I have not overstated it; and I speak of it with more of confidence from the circumstance that I have had occasion in a professional way, within a year or two, for a client, to discuss this question in the Supreme Court, and to find out what the law was by their decision, which was adverse in one instance to the case I was maintaining—I turn now to the report to see what the facts are and what has taken place. You will observe that this grant was made, an open grant, on the 2d of July, 1864. The report proceeds to state that—

October 24, 1864, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon designated the Oregon Central Military Wagon Road Company as the company to receive the grant and construct the said road.

That was on the 24th of October, 1864, so that at that time no location of the line had been made, no work had been done, and the grant was still afloat. Now, on the 14th of October, 1864, ten days previous to that designation by the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, before they had taken any steps in respect of the grant at all, we made this treaty with the Klamath Indians. It is true that the treaty was not ratified until a long time afterward; but the Government of the United States, acting through its President and within the limits of his constitutional authority, had entered into this engagement subject to the ratification and approval of the Senate.

I state again on that subject that I understand the law to be perfectly well settled that a treaty of that character, so far as it fixes the rights of the two parties, takes effect whenever ratified—from the date of it. It was ratified February 17, 1870. It was made the 14th of October, 1864. In this treaty it was provided that the Indians cede to the United States all the lands in this section of Oregon. Of course I need not read the description, but out of them were reserved and set apart by description of metes and bounds this Klamath reservation. So that on the 14th of October, 1864, and before the Legislature of Oregon had taken any step under this grant at all, the President of the United States——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish you would let me finish the sentence, Mr. President. The President of the United States had, under his constitutional authority, as everybody agreed, entered into an engagement with these Indians, subject to the approval of the Senate, that this particular reservation in which these road-builders now claim rights as grantees should be set apart forever for the use of the Indians. Now, I undertake to say that upon that state of the dates the law is, in my opinion, that the Indians, instead of these road-builders, became the proprietors of this reservation, and that the road-builders therefore got no title at all to the sections of land where they located their road across this reservation because it had then been reserved by the President of the United States, subject to the approval of the Senate, for the use of these Indians, and because, as I said in the first place, at that time it was Indian land which the United States recognized the right of the Indians to dispose of, and they disposed of them to the United States excepting this reservation, which was retained for the use of the Indians forever.

Now, Mr. President, upon that state of the case, it does appear to me that we are making haste to give away the lands of the United States to the injury of the people of Oregon—but of course that is a matter for my friend—to the injury of the people of all the United States. To give them to persons who claim under a grant which, in respect of these lands, where the road crosses this reservation that was settled and located before they got their title at all under the State of Oregon even, is going greatly too far. But the morning hour has expired, and I will not take up more of your time at the present moment.

Mr. WEST. Before the regular order is proceeded with, I desire to submit a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will yield for that.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST submitted the following report:

"That section 11 of the act approved June 23, 1874, be, and is hereby, repealed, and that the following be enacted in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 5. That the postmasters shall be divided into four classes, as follows: The first class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are $1,000, or more than $3,000; the second class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $3,000, but not less than $2,000; the third class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $2,000, but not less than $1,000; the fourth class shall embrace all postmasters whose annual compensation, exclusive of their commissions on the money-order business of their offices, amounts to less than $1,000.

"SEC. 6. That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed or suspended according to law; and postmasters of the fourth class shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the Postmaster-General, by whom all appointments and removals shall be notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

"SEC. 7. That the respective compensations of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, assigned in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster-General, from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof, for four quarters immediately preceding the adjustment or re-adjustment, by adding to an amount of the box-rents of the office received or estimated not exceeding $1,350 when the boxes are supplied and owned by the postmaster, and two-thirds of the box-rents, and not to exceed $1,000 when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster, commissions on all other postal revenues of the office to an amount not exceeding $1,350, at the following rates, namely: on the first $100 per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $300 per quarter, 50 per cent.; on all over $300 and not over $700 per quarter, 40 per cent.; and 30 per cent. on all revenues exceeding $700 per quarter, but the aggregate of the said commissions not to exceed $1,350; and at all offices where the total revenues exceed, respectively, $4,000 per annum, there shall be added to the compensation hereinbefore provided from box-rents and commissions a percentage of the gross revenues at the following rates, namely: 1 per cent. on all sums over $4,000 and not exceeding $10,000; 9-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000; 8-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $20,000 and not exceeding $40,000; 6-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $40,000 and not exceeding $80,000; 5-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $80,000 and not exceeding $160,000; 4-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $160,000 and not exceeding $320,000; 3-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $320,000 and not exceeding $640,000; 2-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $640,000 and not exceeding $1,280,000; and 1-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums exceeding $1,280,000; and in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case: Provided, That at offices where the letter-carrier system is now, or may hereafter be, established, the box-rents, in fixing the compensation of the respective postmasters at such offices, shall be estimated at not less than $1,000 per annum; but at all such offices where the compensation is now $4,000 they shall be estimated at an amount which, with the commissions and percentages hereby allowed, will make the salaries of the postmasters thereat not less than $3,000.

"SEC. 8. That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the box-rents collected at their offices, and commissions on other postal revenues of their offices at the following rate, namely: On the first $100 or less per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $300 per quarter, 50 per cent.; and all over $300 per quarter, 40 per cent.; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of such postmasters: Provided, That when the aggregate annual compensation, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, of any postmaster of this class shall amount to $1,000, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General in order that such postmaster may be assigned to his proper class and his salary fixed as heretofore provided.

"SEC. 9. That the salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be re-adjusted by the Postmaster-General once in two years, and in special cases, on the application of the postmaster, as much oftener as the Postmaster-General may deem expedient.

"SEC. 10. That the Postmaster-General shall make all orders assigning or changing the salaries of postmasters in writing, and record them in his journal, and notify the change to the Auditor; and any change made in such salaries shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order: Provided, That in cases of not less than 50 per cent increase or decrease in the business of any post-office, the Postmaster-General may adjust the salary of the postmaster at such office to take effect from the first day of the quarter or period the returns for which form the basis of re-adjustment.

"SEC. 11. That the Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail-routes as distributing or separating offices; and where any such office is of the third or fourth class, he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duties, and the provisions of this act relating to and fixing the compensation or salaries of postmasters shall take effect on the 1st day of October next.

"SEC. 12. No salary of any postmaster under this act shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum except in the city of New York, which salary shall remain as now fixed by law; and no salary of any postmaster where the appointment is now presidential shall be reduced by the compensation herein established until the next re-adjustment, below the sum of $1,000 per annum."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 46 and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the following:

"SEC. 14. That transient newspapers and magazines, regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates, and all printed matter of the third class, except unsealed circulars, shall be admitted to, and be transmitted in, the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces, or fractional part thereof, and one cent for each two additional ounces, or fractional part thereof, and the sender of any article of the third class of mail matter may write his or her name or address therein, or on the outside thereof, with the word 'from' above or preceding the same; or may write briefly or print on any package the number and names of the articles inclosed. Publishers of newspapers and periodicals may print on the wrappers of newspapers or magazines sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers the time to which subscription therefor has been paid; and addresses upon postal cards and unsealed circulars may be either written, printed, or affixed thereto at the option of the sender."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the numerical correction of sections be made to correspond with the changes in the bill herein made.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have read once more a provision back three or four pages fixing at $3,000 the minimum of certain salaries.

The section proposed by the conference report as section 7 was read.

Mr. MORTON. That report is a very important one, and I hope it will be printed and laid on the table till the day after to-morrow.

Mr. WEST. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before that passes from the Senate I should like to have that part of the report which relates to the appointment of postmasters by the President read.

Mr. WEST. I will mention to the Senator that it has just been agreed, before the adoption of this report, that it shall be printed and laid before us the day after to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that; but I should like to have that part of it read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest, also, in order to enable us to understand it when printed, that it be so printed as to show the bill as it will stand as amended.

The Chief Clerk read section 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed with the amendments, and the bill as it will be if amended as proposed by the committee of conference.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. C. C. SNIFFEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 46) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Walla Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company across Fort Walla Walla military reservation in Washington Territory;

An act (S. No. 558) making a further appropriation for the erection of Government buildings in Dover, Delaware; and

An act (S. No. 634) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867.

POST-ROAD BILL.

Mr. FERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls up the unfinished business.

Mr. KELLY. I hope my colleague will consent to the disposition of the bill which was under consideration during the morning hour. I do not think it will take any length of time now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection, if the Senator from Indiana consents.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senate will go on with the unfinished business. I am satisfied my friend will have no difficulty about his measure. This matter has been on hand now for some time, and we ought to dispose of it.

EXPLANATIONS AS TO PRINTING EXPENSES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask permission of the Senator from Indiana to make a short statement in order to correct a part of the proceedings of Saturday. I see in the RECORD a statement made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] (who I am sorry not to see in his seat, for I am quite sure he desired to do no injustice and would be happy to hear the correction) of the comparative expenses of the public printing for several years. In the course of his remarks he stated that in 1873 the expenses for printing in the Interior Department were $70,000, whereas now they are estimated at $225,000; that the expenses of this item for the Post-Office Department in 1873 were $87,000, and that now they are $175,000; that in 1873 the printing of the War Department cost $43,000, and that now it is to cost $120,000.

The table for 1873 containing these small amounts, as compared with the estimates for the present year, is only for three months, and it is so stated in the report of the Congressional Printer, from which the table is taken. I will read the heading of it:

By the law of May, 1872, it is provided that the several Departments of the Government shall make annual estimates for the printing and binding required of them respectively for the year, to take full effect on the 1st of July, 1873, and the following is the result therefor, for the first three months, ending September 30:

So that these small figures for the printing of 1873 are only for the three months commencing on the 1st of July, 1873, and ending on the 30th of September, 1873.

It is not necessary for me to repeat that I am quite sure that the mistake in which my friend from Maryland was led was unintentional on his part, and I hope it was so on the part of those who led him into it.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask to add a single word. Some question was raised on Saturday as to the comparative appropriations for printing this year and last. At the time I did not have the figures before me, but stated from my general recollection that the Senate amendments were the same as last year's appropriation. I find on examination since that there is a slight reduction in two items. The Supreme Court is $5,000 less than last year and the Court of Claims $2,000 less than last year. The other items are the same as those appropriated last year throughout, except that there is an item of $15,000 for the Library, which was not in the last year's appropriation.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2676) to regulate the assessment and collection of taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

A bill (H. R. No. 597) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2691) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, April 17:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he was a contestant up to the period of the determination of the contest by the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am so thoroughly impressed with the want of justice and the want of law for the allowance of this large sum of money that I am impelled to state the reasons of my objection to the passage of the resolution. If this were an ordinary case in which a right of membership in this body had been duly and regularly contested under that clause of the Constitution which gives to each State an equal representation in the Senate and forbids that a State shall be deprived of that right without her own consent; if the fact were that on behalf and in the name of a State of this Union a representative had presented himself here on fair public grounds and under cover of the law and a claim of the right, even though the result showed that he was not adjudged to be entitled to a seat, and a committee of this body having due jurisdiction, and having taken counsel, should have reported that the expenses of the party who came here, not for private ends but on behalf of his State, should be borne; that the State should not only have her day in court but that she should have her day without cost in money, so strong is the presumption in favor of the right of the State to be represented that I should not criticise perhaps the methods under which a resolution was presented to bear the expenses of the person who proposed to represent that State. The claim of a person coming under such circumstances is proper to be weighed, proper to be decided, and there is a dignity attending such a contest when properly conducted which renders some measure of compensation proper and just and reasonable. If in such a case as that the amount reported by the committee had been in accordance with anything at all like precedent I should have contented myself with saying:

The court awards it, and the law doth give it.

And I should have said no more upon the subject. But, Mr. President, look at this case. Look at it in its substance; look at it in its truth; look at it by the light of history; look at it by the light of law; look at it in any light that commends itself to human reason; and what is there of it to justify this large sum of $20,000 being taken from the public Treasury and handed to a man who not only has never given one hour or one moment of honest service to the public, but who has come here prosecuting a claim that has time and again been declared to be devoid of law and to be devoid of right? Twenty thousand dollars may seem to some men a small sum. To the average American it is not so. It is a sum which not very often crowns a life of toil, and which many honest and worthy men would only feel too grateful to be able to leave to their children surviving them. Here is a proposition, plain and distinct, that a man who, as I said, never did one moment's honest service to this country, who never stood or voted in this Chamber, shall receive the same pay for three years, with mileage added, and not only mileage, but constructive mileage added, to roll up the sum of $20,000 to be taken from the public Treasury of this country at a time when alarm and distrust pervade the entire land, and economy as well as justice is necessarily called for.

I do not propose to recite at length the mortifying, the scandalous history of political events in Louisiana during the last four years. I consider it a blot on the page of American history; and no man to the extent of his ability has done more to dye that page of history with disgrace and stain it with infamy than the individual who here claims the sum of $20,000 from the public Treasury of the United States. I do not speak from rumor; I speak from the records, the reports and proceedings of this House and the other branch of Congress. Go there and see from what soil sprung these rights; in what a cause and in what corruption were generated this candidacy and this candidate. In 1872, in that wretched and discreditable pool of politics then existing in Louisiana, Governor Warmoth and Pinchback the State senator acted in full accord. A place in the senate was made vacant by the unfortunate death of the colored lieutenant-governor of the State, Dunn, I believe, was his name, a man of whom I have heard all parties speak with respect. By his death unfortunately the lieutenant-governorship, the presidency of the senate, was left vacant. By means described in reports of committees to the other House, Mr. Pinchback's election to the presidency of that senate was accomplished. Stepping upon the stones of an illegal advancement to the presidency of that State senate, he was made acting governor by the revolutionary proceedings in which he took part, the impeachment and removal of Warmoth, a proceeding so farcical that it would be truly amusing were it not also so tragical. The forms of law, the constitution of Louisiana, the laws of Louisiana were trampled under foot. They were made the sport and the foot-ball of a reckless, desperate band of men.

Warmoth was thrown out of office by an absurd pretense of impeachment, that scarcely lasted enough hours to let the ink dry on the proceedings against him. All laws, and all forms, and all facts were rejected, and Pinchback became the acting governor of Louisiana. As acting governor, he let himself thoroughly into the scenes of revolution that were enacted there under the orders of Durell. The whole State government of Louisiana was prostrated before a combination of fraud and forced by a lawless administration coupled with fraud and outrage on the part of those who proposed to represent the State of Louisiana. So it was that the power which made him lieutenant-governor was lawless; the power which made him acting governor was lawless; and the power which made him Senator of the United States by the form of election was just the same as all the rest. All were founded upon fraud; all were founded upon force. There never was either the substance or the forms of law regarded; but yet it was under such color that he presented himself here with credentials, signed by a governor who had no more right to sign them than he had to sign them himself. As acting governor, he certified himself to the other House as member of Congress, and Kellogg certified him to the Senate, all the result of an illegal combination.

His case was brought before the Senate. His credentials were presented. At the time this was done the grave question was presented to the Senate whether there was or was not a State government in Louisiana. After much labor and great diligence, the Committee on Privileges and Elections almost unanimously reported that there was no State government in Louisiana, and brought in a bill to hold an election in order to create a State government, under the authority of Congress supposed to be found in provisions of the Federal Constitution. That report was signed, stating these facts, after due consideration, by Mr. Carpenter, then Senator from Wisconsin; by Mr. ANTHONY, the Senator from Rhode Island; by Mr. LOGAN, the Senator from Illinois, and by Mr. ALCORN, the Senator from Mississippi. The same results were reached, so far as the rights of the Pinchback or Kellogg party were concerned, by the report of Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, and by that of Mr. Hill, of Georgia. So that at the time these credentials came here there seemed to be no one in the Senate, scarce even the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] or, if he stood here he stood almost alone, who asserted that there was a legislature capable of electing Pinchback or anybody else to the Senate at the time he was elected. But we have had here, not in this case alone, but in many others, strong proof of the ability, of the fertility, of the persistency, of the great influence of the honorable Senator from Indiana, and he did raise this minority of his party from a scanty handful to an almost equal number of the Senate; so that a title which had no ground in right, which had no ground in law, which had no report of any kind in its favor, gradually by some kind of acquiescence hardened into a color of right which commanded the vote of a large number of the Senate. Finally the decision of the Senate was made. It was made upon an issue of law and fact. The issue was that this man was not entitled to his place because there was no Legislature to elect him; that there stood no entity of a State which was to be recognized by the Senate as a body to be represented in this Chamber. I cannot believe, I will not believe until I see it recorded by their votes, that the decision of the Senate, so made upon strict law and after a most careful and elaborate examination of fact, is to be reversed for the purpose of paying this money to so unmeritorious a claimant. If ever there was a principle sound in law and in morals, it is that a man shall not be suffered to take advantage of his own wrong; and yet here for this fraud, this wrong upon the people of a State, this falsehood, this misrepresentation, which was chiefly concocted by this individual for his own benefit, he is to receive a large and unprecedented pecuniary reward at the hands of the American Senate!

Look at it reasonably. Part of his compensation has been calculated for the time occupied in the recess of Congress when none of us are at service but simply are held for service in case we may be called here to perform our duties. On the 17th of March, 1875, after an elaborate discussion, after this man's case or this man's rights or the rights of the State had been, at public expense and to the detriment of public business, discussed for weeks and weeks, when we had approached the day when the vote was to be taken, when, if I am correctly informed, the day had been fixed for the vote to be taken, I find that the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] who seemed to be the representative especially of the claimant for his rights in the Chamber, arose and moved—

That the further consideration of this subject be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

And so upon a vote of yeas and nays the consideration of the case was postponed at what I must consider the instance, the request, or certainly with the consent of the claimant. It was postponed for some reason for six months longer, and so the bill of the people of the United States for services never to be rendered is increased by the sum of perhaps $5,000. That is the act of the party. Where is the equity that a man shall postpone the decision of his case with so many of the Senate, or one-half of the Senate, ready to vote upon it, and then say "I do it because my pay will go on; without service I shall take my pay, and I shall be rewarded for that which I never earned and which I never served for?"

It has been sought to sustain this claim upon something like law or something like precedent. There is no precedent for it; there is no law for it. The case, thank Heaven, has no precedent as far as the history of any State is concerned, or the proceedings relating to the election, and I trust in mercy it never may be repeated.

It has been sought to find, from a report made by my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] in the case of Sykes, some justification for the appropriation of this money. In that report the committee say:

The rule established by the Senate in cases similar to the present one has been uniform. A person applying for a seat in this body by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application has been refused and another adjudged entitled to the seat, has been paid the amount he would have been entitled to receive if he had been admitted and served the time the contest was pending.

Here is a most important omission: a person entitled "by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State." This is not the case of Mr. Pinchback. The Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1873, by an overwhelming majority, by an almost unanimous report, declared that there was no State government in Louisiana, and therefore no State Legislature capable of an election. That was their decision.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAYARD. I will yield to the Senator in one moment. Not only that, but the Senate at the time this case was decided, had the precise issue made before it, and it was the essential fact, the hinge upon which the case turned, whether or not there ever was a legal Legislature capable of electing Pinchback to the Senate, and the decision was that there was no such Legislature. Therefore the reasons given in the citation from Mr. Cooper's report do not apply to this case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I inquire whether the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the Senate of the United States both did not in the very case to which the report of the honorable Senator from Tennessee refers decide that the body that elected or attempted to elect Mr. Sykes never was the Legislature of the State of Alabama?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know what it may have decided, but I mean to say the report which the honorable Senator has offered here to sustain his position is based upon the language which I have read, which is that—

A person applying for a seat in this body by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application has been refused—

Would still be entitled to pay under certain circumstances. There was the prime and essential question, was he elected by the Legislature of a State? Your Committee on Privileges and Elections told you in 1873 that Pinchback was not; that there was no Legislature to elect him; and that there was no government in the State of Louisiana containing a State Legislature. So in 1876 the same result was reached by a deliberate vote of the Senate. But let us go further. The report states that he shall claim the seat—

By reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application has been refused and another adjudged entitled to his seat.

There has been no adjudication of anybody being entitled to a seat from Louisiana. The citation from the report of Mr. COOPER in the case of Sykes contains the whole of it; the report is set out in length. The whole doctrine of that report justifying the allowance to a claimant of a seat is that, by reason of the election of a Legislature, although the party has had his application refused and another party has been adjudged entitled to the seat, he has a right to claim compensation under the practice of the Senate. The case of Pinchback has no parallel facts; it does not stand at all upon the same foundation; it cannot be reached by the reason that underlies this report. The case of Pinchback is a case where there was no Legislature to elect; where no one has been adjudged entitled to the seat, and where the question of compensation between two has not arisen in any way or form and cannot arise.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to say to the Senator that the case of Sykes is not the case he states at all. In the case of Sykes the decision of the Senate was that Sykes was not elected by a Legislature; that the body that elected him was no Legislature at all; it was a mere sham. SPENCER'S election did not depend upon Sykes's rejection at all. They were not even contestants with each other in any proper sense. To be that, they must have been elected by the same body; but SPENCER was elected by another body altogether, and that was the Legislature of Alabama; and so far as Sykes was concerned it was no difference whether there was any other body at all or whether SPENCER or any one else was elected. It was decided by this Senate, and it must be assumed to be the fact, that Sykes was elected by a body that was no Legislature, a mere sham, a pretended body.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, Mr. President, it is very unfortunate for the Senator who approved this report that he should have given the wrong reasons by citing the report of Mr. COOPER as authorizing the payment of this money to Pinchback. I do not propose to discuss the case of Sykes against Spencer. The facts of Sykes against Spencer do not come into the case; but it has pleased the committee who made this report proposing to give this vast sum of money to Pinchback, to use the language of Mr. COOPER'S report in the case of Sykes to justify the payment of Pinchback, and I say that the facts and the reasons given by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] have no parallel, have nothing to do with the Pinchback case, do not refer to it as a matter of fact, and are in fact inconsistent with it. The doctrine laid down in that report is that where a man by reason of an election by the Legislature of a State, although his application for a seat has been refused, and although another person has been adjudged entitled to the seat which he claims, comes forward and asks for compensation for the contest, the practice and custom of the Senate will award it to him. That is the doctrine laid down by Mr. COOPER as justifying the action of the Senate in the case of Sykes.

When you come to Pinchback's case you find none of these essential bases for the granting of this money. In the first place you find no Legislature to elect; you find no State government to be represented; and you find no one contesting adjudged entitled to the seat. Therefore, when you strip this case of the facts, the reason ceases with it and it has no application whatever.

But let me go further. The reason in the report which has been cited here, therefore, applies to a totally different class of facts from those before the Senate, not only technically but substantially, not simply in fiction of law but in the sternest substance of truth and fact. They further say:

A proper respect for the action of a State in the choice of a Senator may also justify the rule.

But, Mr. President, what scant respect has been paid to the action of a State! Louisiana ground into the dust, her true voice stifled, her constitution overthrown, her laws treated with contempt, and the man who has been one of the chief conspirators of this crime comes to this Chamber and they propose to treat him with respect in order to honor the State that he has insulted and assisted to overthrow!

Mr. President, this case has no merits to commend it to the Senate or the country. The people of this country have traditions still of respectability and honesty and home-bred virtue, all of which have been violated throughout by this man's conduct in this case. Is he to come before the Senate to claim respect; and the gentleman who engineers his claim in this body brings the record of a jail to show that it is a malefactor that stands before the people of the United States and asks to take part in their legislation and mold their laws! And for that he is to be paid—the prison record with a sentence of long imprisonment, with the crime effaced and the record garbled, mutilated, and brought here to disguise the fact for which he was sent to jail! Why, sir, what is there to commend this case? What can there be to commend this case? There is no parliamentary law, there is no constitutional law, there is no question of justice to a meritorious and honest claimant; there is nothing from the debt of justice itself, nothing ex æquo et bono which should commend itself to men's equity. And why should this vast sum of money, this just recompense for a life-long struggle of honest toil, be awarded to a man so perfectly without merit, without law, without justice to base his claim upon?

I trust, sir, that the sense of the Senate will see that if there is to be a high discretion, a generous discretion governing them and applicable to a case of this kind, this is a case in which such largess is to be withheld and not granted; that the case has no merits, legal or moral, none in law, none in fact, to justify this transportation of so large a bulk of the people's money into the hands of one who, I am compelled to believe by the records of every report made to Congress, by the records of the reports of investigating committees signed by gentlemen of the republican party, can only be termed, in most restrained language, a characterless adventurer.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn into another discussion of the Louisiana case. I supposed that had been discussed to the satisfaction of Senators on this floor, and of the country. The principle involved in this resolution has been settled so often and so uniformly in the same direction that it seemed to me that even the most bitter partisanship could make no argument against its adoption.

The Senator from Delaware says that the history of Louisiana is a foul blot upon our civilization; that Louisiana was ground in the dust, was degraded as a State. I agree to that. I agree that a large majority of the people of Louisiana were stricken down, or attempted to be stricken down by violence and fraud. The attempt has been made in this body to make that enormous fraud a success by giving to the minority of the people of that State the control obtained by violence, by murder, and by fraud of every description.

It is as well known as any other fact that in 1872 there was a republican majority in the State of Louisiana on a fair election of from 15,000 to 20,000. This was recognized by men on both sides; and the very report the Senator refers to shows that fact. It was reported by the very Senators whose names he mentioned, and that an attempt was made to destroy that majority by unlawful and wicked means. It has been insisted that the attempt succeeded; that this large majority was stricken down, and that the minority was triumphant; but I shall not go into that matter to-day. I say it was an enormous wrong; it was wicked; it was a blow at the free institutions of this country, and the cry and the grief to-day is that it was not successful in every particular. And, sir, I feel that it is to be repeated. Repeated it was last year in the State of Mississippi, and a majority of 30,000 stricken down by the same means; and now we are about entering upon a great contest, and the success of one party in this country depends upon overthrowing by fraud and violence an aggregate republican majority of not less than 90,000 in four or five States of this Union. It is confidently expected that it will be overthrown by the same means; that the shot-gun argument will prevail in Louisiana, in Mississippi again, in Alabama again, and in South Carolina, where an organization is now being made, as we are advised, for that very purpose.

I should not have referred to these things but for the language of the Senator from Delaware. He has brought them here again. But when he talks about the blot on the history of this country in Louisiana in 1872–'73 I want to tell him what the blot is. That blot is the result of a base and infamous attempt to strike down a majority of the people of that State by fraud and violence, and the complaint to-day is that it did not fully succeed.

The Senator tries to make a distinction between this and the Sykes case. He says the doctrine of the report of the Senator from Tennessee in the Sykes case was that the contestant must have been elected by a Legislature, but he did not get his seat, and it was given to somebody else. The Senator is entirely mistaken. If the Senator from Tennessee had contended for that, he would have left nothing for Sykes to stand on, because it was decided in the Sykes case that Sykes was not elected by a Legislature, but by a mere pretense; that the Legislature met elsewhere and was composed of an entirely different body of men. He was elected by a mere debating society, a mere sham, and so it was held. Whether he got his seat or not did not affect SPENCER'S right. SPENCER'S right depended upon his election by another body, a different Legislature, and it was so decided by the Senate.

Mr. President, it has been constantly accorded by the Senate, and I believe by the other branch of Congress—I know of no exception to the rule—that in a contest of this kind the party should be paid. If Pinchback is not paid, it is simply because he is made an exception to what, so far as I can learn, has been a universal rule, and I regard his case as one of the most meritorious that has ever come before this body. Without intending to find fault with those who voted against his admission, I must say that, so far as my judgment is concerned, it was a great wrong, and I have known no greater individual wrong to be perpetrated in this body. I believe he was entitled to his seat. But whether he was or not, under the rule that has been adopted in this body ever since its organization, so far as I know, and in the other House, he is entitled to the compensation provided in this resolution. In the case of Sykes, in regard to a body that never made a law, that was never recognized by any one as being a Legislature, that was a fraud and a sham and a miserable pretense from the beginning, it is reported, and the Senator justifies that report, that Mr. Sykes should have his compensation precisely on the same principle. But here is the Kellogg government, recognized by the national Executive in every branch, legislative and executive, recognized by the democratic House of Representatives, recognized by the Senate; a government that made laws that have governed the State and been recognized by all the courts of the State and even by the courts of the United States. In that case we are told that the rule is to be broken down, that the principle does not apply. Why does it not apply? If it does not apply, it is simply because this man belongs to a different race; and I say now, if this rule is to be broken down in this case, it will show to the world that so far as colored men are concerned there is no rule strong enough to protect them; that some reason and some argument can be found in every instance where their rights are involved to make a change. What security will they have in the future, if their rights are placed in the keeping of a party that will in this body disregard its usage for half a century and violate every principle to deprive one of them of being placed in the same situation that every other contestant has been placed in? It will show to the world that they have nothing to expect. There have been payments made since I have been here the merits of which were not one-hundredth part what those of this claim are.

But it is said the case was put off. It did hang on a long time; but it was never put off except by a vote of a majority of the Senate, and it was brought to a vote when the Senate was ready to have it brought to a vote. That is the case with every other contested election, so far as I know.

But, Mr. President, I have referred to some things that do not belong to this question. I have only referred to them, however, in answer to what was said by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the record of what has fallen from me in this debate will disclose the fact whether any reference was made to the race or color or previous condition of this claimant. I am sure that no such reference was made by me, because no such reason entered into my mind for anything that I said or any vote I proposed to cast. I dealt with this claimant just as though he had been a man of my own race, and I could give him just the rights under the circumstances that I would give to my own people; so much and no more. But the honorable Senator may find possibly—he is a very adroit man—some usefulness in referring to an issue not raised by me. He may set up his own man of straw and he may knock him down at pleasure. There may be something gained by his doing it; I cannot perceive what it is, and I leave it to be enjoyed by himself.

But something else fell from the Senator. He was pleased to say something not simply in regard to Louisiana, the only State concerned in this matter, but to go further and refer in my presence to what he called "the shot-gun argument in Mississippi." Now, sir, I have some knowledge of what he calls "the shot-gun argument in Mississippi;" and let me tell the Senator here, and let me tell the Senate and the country, that, when the time comes for the evidence taken in Mississippi to be brought before the country and reported, they will find where the shot-gun policy originated; who it was that built it up. That report will show the governor of the State, armed by the laws of that State with the right and the duty to protect its people, deliberately waging a war with weapons upon unarmed men, and massing one race against the other for the destruction of both. Then he will find that if there were shot-guns they were shot-guns gathered hastily for the defense of fireside and home, for the defense of rights that every American holds dear and of all that manhood should seek to protect, and if it failed to protect would be unworthy of the name. He will find a canvass conducted in 1875 under the charge of the Federal Government to this extent, that a man unknown to the laws of the country, unknown even to official name, was sent down to superintend the canvass, and to bring down, if necessary, the armed forces of the United States to back the militia forces of the State; that the canvass, on the part of the white people of Mississippi, was conducted under the joint intimidation of the governor, backed by his armed bands of negroes and of the United States Government threatening to go down with military force in case such resistance was made as threatened the peace of the election. These are the facts which I pledge the Senator and the country will be fully established when the testimony shall be presented. Nor would I have referred to them now had they not been brought into this debate voluntarily by the Senator from Indiana who has already in my presence, before the Senate and before the country, undertaken to give in advance a terrible picture of affairs in Mississippi which will not be borne out when the facts come to be shown to the Senate which this committee has collected.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I am quite surprised to find an issue presented in the debate upon the resolution for the payment of Mr. Pinchback entirely foreign to the question.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has alluded to the State of Mississippi and the condition of affairs which was found to exist there by the committee which has just returned from that State, of which he and I are members.

I undertake to say, sir, that the investigations by that committee, so far from showing that the governor of that State attempted to array in hostility the black race against the white people of that State, will show that during the campaign of 1875 there was an armed force of white men, democrats, throughout that whole State prepared and determined to carry that election by any means within their power, and that the slaughter of the colored people of that State will astonish not only the members of this Senate, but the whole country.

I undertake to say, sir, that the condition of affairs developed by that investigation will show that the constituted authorities of the State were unable to protect the republicans, white and black, in their right to peaceably assemble and discuss political affairs during the election canvass, and that the State executive committee of the democratic party agreed by what is known as the "treaty of peace" to secure a fair election at the election then approaching.

The investigation, sir, will show a slaughter throughout that State of the black people which will shock the people of this country; it will show that in many instances on election-day large numbers of white men, democrats, armed with Winchester rifles, assembled at the polling-places; that armed mounted men from Alabama came over to Mississippi on that day, and in at least one instance a piece of artillery was placed near the polls. It will show, sir, that a white man, a republican, a native of the State and an officer of the law, was compelled, by fear of violence and the presence of armed men, to leave his home on the evening before the election and remain away until the election was over. It will show that great numbers of colored people were through fear driven from the polls without voting, others through intimidation were compelled to vote the democratic ticket, and multitudes prevented from coming to the polls at all; in a word, that that election was carried by murder, violence, intimidation, and fraud.

I only make this statement as I believe it is but just to the people of this country that the remarks of the Senator from Delaware should not go unchallenged at this time.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it was the action of the honorable Senator from Indiana in his remarks that induced and justified what I have stated on this floor. What I have stated is on record. There it will stand. What I have stated shall be hereafter confronted with the testimony in the case. I am not here to bandy assertions with the Senator from Minnesota. With him and with any Senator on this floor I can have no issue of fact unless there be some arbitration to decide between us. In this case it shall be the record of the testimony taken in his presence and mine, and I am quite willing that that testimony shall come; the sooner it comes the better, the more welcome will it be to me that it shall be divulged; and then we shall see whose view of this testimony is the more correct.

I simply stated what I did, believing that I shall be thoroughly sustained by the record-testimony of the order-books of the governor of that State, by the proof the report of the Government agent in that State—not by the proof of democrats, but by the proof of members of the republican party—that, if there was a threat of violence, it was violence created in self-defense, and that the white people of that State would have been less than men if they had not prepared themselves as they might against a danger that threatened to sweep their homes and their children out of existence itself. Whether the apprehension was just or not, whether rumor as usual traveled faster than truth, I will not say. That is yet to be considered. But the negotiation of the executive committee of the democratic party was, as I thank God it always will be found, in favor of peace, of law, of order, of good relations between the two races of that State. The committee, as I consider against the spirit of American law, against my protest and the protest of my colleague from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] seized and brought the whole telegraphic correspondence between the chairman of the executive committee and all other persons whatsoever, every dispatch he had received, every dispatch he had ever sent, no matter from whom or to whom—all were brought and submitted to the committee and are to be published to the world. He had not been called, he was not suffered to explain; and yet I may say—and I think even the honorable Senator from Minnesota will not deny—that from first to last there is not in the whole of that correspondence, carried on when it could not have been believed that it was prepared for any object, there was not one word in any dispatch to justify ill-feeling or disrespect toward Mr. George or any one of his correspondents; not one word, not one suggestion of violence or intimidation. Nay, it is in proof that the agent of the Government, Mr. Chase, himself a resident of the gubernatorial mansion, in close confederacy and intimacy with Governor Ames, caused day by day every complaint that reached the ear of the governor of the State and that was submitted to Mr. Chase to be submitted to the democratic executive committee's chairman, and that they were put to the expense and the trouble and the imperative duty of satisfying the Government agent of the truth or the untruth of the statements made, and that there really was not the cause of the apprehension of violence or the existence of violence which the governor's friends supposed did exist in that State. That was the history of that correspondence.

As to the negotiation there undoubtedly was political organization, there undoubtedly was the array of races. By whom was it made? I take the testimony abundantly to show that it was created for political ends, created not by the democratic party or the white people of Mississippi. The issue was forced upon them either to succumb and be ridden over and trod into the earth until every vestige of manhood was beaten from their faces or to stand where they had a right to stand: in defense of their rights with arms if necessary.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I must be permitted to say that my astonishment still continues that the merits of the investigation by the Mississippi committee have been alluded to here by a member before the investigations by that committee have been finished and before the report has been made to the Senate. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] if he referred to Mississippi affairs at all, referred to them generally. He was not a member of the investigating committee appointed by the Senate, as the Senator from Delaware is.

I repeat what I said before, that the state of affairs in Mississippi revealed by the investigations of this committee will shock this country as it shocked me as I heard from time to time the facts testified to by witnesses before the committee. So far as the democratic state central committee is concerned, I undertake to say that it not only negotiated for a peace between the whites and the administration of that State, but that only by the authority of the chairman of that committee was a white citizen of Mississippi permitted to go to his box and deposit his vote upon the occasion of the election of 1875; that authority from the chairman of that committee only permitted him to do so without sacrificing his life; and other wrongs and outrages developed by this investigation are such as will astonish the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word. I referred to Mississippi affairs simply because the Senator from Delaware had referred to the outrages in Louisiana in 1872, and they were of the same character. What the Senator from Minnesota says corresponds with all that I have learned in regard to the campaign in Mississippi. From what I have heard of the evidence that was taken, I believe it will turn out that the picture that I drew in the Senate last winter was underdrawn.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. I thought at the time that speech was delivered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in the Senate, it was perhaps an exaggeration of the state of facts existing there; but since visiting that community and engaging in this investigation, I can only say that I regard the picture drawn by the Senator on that occasion as a very moderate description of the affair.

Mr. McDONALD. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota if the statement made by the Senator from Delaware is not true that the canvass in Mississippi was carried on under the supervision of an agent representing the Department of Justice who informed the parties there that he had full authority at any time to demand, and it would be sent, the military power of the Federal Government if there was any indication of an unfair election or any attempt at intimidation or fraud? I ask further if he did not remain there until the election closed, and if it is not in proof that he stated after the close of the election that he had seen nothing (not merely from the evidence furnished by the governor of the State but from the evidence furnished by the members of the central committee as well as the evidence furnished by his own emissaries that he had employed in different parts of the State) to authorize military interference on the part of the Federal Government? I ask the Senator if that is not in proof before the committee?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not aware of those facts being in proof. I understand that some allegations of a character similar to that were made on the part of the democratic State executive committee.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask if it is not sworn to by one witness who was examined before us? I ask further if the Senator does not know that the report of that secret emissary has been upon the files of the Department of Justice since shortly after the close of that election?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state to the Senator that I do not know anything of that report, and I am aware that the committee had not that report before them.

Mr. McDONALD. That is not the question. I asked the Senator if he did not know that that report was on the files?

Mr. McMILLAN. Answering for myself, I do not know.

Mr. McDONALD. Very well; I do.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. One moment. I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion of the Mississippi question at this time. All that I desire to say is in reply to the Senator from Indiana on my left, [Mr. McDONALD.] Some evidence was brought before the committee in reference to an agent of the Department of Justice, a Mr. Chase, who has been referred to by the Senator from Delaware; but the testimony of that witness has not been heard before the committee. His testimony will be heard before the committee, and then, when it is produced to the Senate and to the country, the Senate and the country can say whether or not the canvass was conducted under the authority of such an agent. I undertake to say that the canvass was not conducted to any extent under the authority of an agent of the Department of Justice. There was such an agent in the State, and he did to some extent control the murderous elements in the State; but to say that the canvass was conducted under his authority and by his direction is an exaggeration of the truth.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator does not mean to say that it is an exaggeration of what was stated in the testimony taken.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think the only witness who testified in regard to it was, as the Senator from Minnesota has stated, a member of the State democratic central committee—no, I do not know that he is a member of that committee, but at any rate he is the editor of the leading democratic paper in the State.

Mr. McDONALD. There were other witnesses also who referred to it—who were referred to as being present when the treaty that has been spoken of was consummated in the governor's council.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There were.

Mr. WITHERS. I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire whether it is in order and in consonance with the practice of this body to disclose the facts which may or may not have been elicited before a committee of this body in advance of the presentation of the report of that committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think that point of order ought to have been made some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALCORN in the chair.) The Chair will not undertake to set any limits on debate in the Senate; they have not been prescribed, and as a matter of course Senators always indulge in whatever course of remark they may think proper.

Mr. MORTON. I believe I did not allude to the report of the committee until after the Senator from Delaware had first referred to it.

Mr. BAYARD. It had been introduced by the Senator from Indiana prior to that time.

Mr. MORTON. Not by me, I think. I did not refer to the report of the committee at all. I referred to the state of affairs in Mississippi, but not to the action of the committee at all. I did not undertake to say anything about that; but after the Senator from Delaware had spoken of it, I did then say that from what I had learned about the testimeny that was taken, the picture I had drawn was underdrawn and not overdrawn, and that I believe to be the fact. The question as to what the agent of the Department of Justice may have said or done, is a mere diversion; it does not affect the facts in the case at all.

Mr. President, while Mississippi was under discussion last winter, I brought before this Senate extracts from nearly every democratic newspaper in that State, taken from them from week to week during the canvass, a kind of testimony that could not be answered for a moment; and that testimony taken from democratic papers from week to week in every part of the State presented the foundation of the picture I drew, and which I am informed by the Senator from Minnesota has been more than established by the proof.

But, sir, we have heard in answer that every one of the Ku-Klux outrages in the South, from the very beginning of reconstruction up to the present time, that the negroes provoked them; and here in Mississippi, with a majority of more than thirty thousand republicans, we are told that the negroes, unarmed, poor, unprotected, found it necessary to make an assault upon the whites who were armed and disciplined to procure themselves to be murdered, in order to make a little capital for us in the North. It is the old story of the negroes, helpless, unarmed, and defenseless, provoking their powerful neighbors to slaughter them! Sir, I never believed that story when it was first told in justification of the Ku-Klux outrages in South Carolina and other Southern States, and I do not believe it now. Senators are mistaken when they present a defense of that kind.

But, Mr. President, this is all foreign to this discussion. As I am not responsible for bringing it in I again call the attention of the Senate to the resolution, and hope that the vote may be taken.

Mr. SAULSBURY addressed the Senate in opposition to the resolution. Having spoken for some time—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me, as it is almost the Fourth of July, for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly I will.

[Mr. SAULSBURY's speech will be published after it shall have been concluded.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put a division was called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] wishes to have an executive session for a moment or two, and I withdraw my motion to adjourn and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 3, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted on their amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3748) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. RANSOM.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to ask unanimous consent of the gentleman from Illinois and of the whole House to allow my colleague——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HURLBUT. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question as to the order of business. Is not the first business in order at the present time the bill offered last Monday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] to repeal the resumption act? Is not that the first business in order this morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call rests with the State of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio, if he desires, can again ask leave to introduce his bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill went over upon a gentleman rising to debate it. As I understand, it comes up in regular order this morning.

Mr. EAMES. I object to any debate.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SPARKS said: My colleague, Mr. HARTZELL, is absent on account of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] that the House adjourn.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion.

SOLDIERS OF THE EIGHTH MISSOURI CAVALRY.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia.

The bill, as amended, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War and the Adjutant-General of the Army of the United States to remove the charge of desertion against William T. Campbell, Josiah B. Newman, Joseph W. Campbell, Jesse E. Conts, Alexander Lewis, Absalom Edwards, Enock Newman, Calvin C. Simonds, Amos Brown, Martin Silvey, Joseph R. Williams, Marion Carver, David W. McHenry, Phineas Green, Richard N. Dority, James M. Bell, and John Brown, late soldiers of Company I, Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, and James Tombs, of Company F, Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia; and that they be restored to their rights as fully as if they had not been reported as deserters, with loss of all pay and allowances for the time they were absent from their command without leave.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHILIPS] will have the report read.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2524 for the relief of William T. Campbell and others, late soldiers Company I, and James Tombs, Company F, Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, having considered the same, beg leave to report:

That the claimants were soldiers in the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia. This was an arm of the service consisting of ten thousand men, provided for in 1861 by a special agreement between the governor of Missouri and the President of the United States, in the pay of the General Government and subject to the regulations governing the Army of the United States. The common understanding was that this force, as its name would indicate, was designed more especially for service in the State of Missouri, which was then and during all the war the scene of military operations and intestine strifes, though the force was subject to go beyond the limits of the State to repel a threatened invasion. It is, however, a matter of history that the understanding among the men at the time of their enlistment was that they were to do duty within the territorial limits of the State. In the fall of 1862 this regiment, with others of this force, was ordered to the southern line of the State, where it was joined by a large volunteer force under command of General John M. Schofield, who designed a campaign against a force of the enemy collected in and about Fayetteville, Arkansas, about thirty-eight miles south of the line separating Missouri from Arkansas. When the Missouri State Militia were ordered across the line on this expedition there was great murmuring and discontent among them, they contending and protesting that they could not, under the terms of their enlistment, be carried across the line. This notion and feeling was shared to some extent by their immediate company officers. A considerable number of these men, including the claimants here, refused to march into Arkansas, and remained in Missouri. Learning that they had erred in this action, they returned, after an absence of about forty days, to their command, and served faithfully during the remainder of the war, participating in many severe battles, and acquitting themselves always as true soldiers, rendering important service to the Government. For this refusal to cross the line in this one instance they were reported on their muster-rolls as deserters, and have ever since labored under this odium and disability.

Your committee, while impressed with a sense of the importance of maintaining discipline in the Army and of denying to the soldier the right to determine for himself the propriety or authority of any order coming to him from his commanding officer, yet, in view of the peculiar circumstances of this case, can but regard the report of desertion against these men as one of extreme hardship and severity. Their early return to their command and subsequent fidelity negative the idea of any intent to desert the service, and it does seem that the report should have been modified to an absence without leave and the penalties inflicted for such an offense. Such action was had as to other soldiers in other regiments with good results. The assertion made against these men that they deserted in the face of the enemy is not well founded, as the enemy at that time was distant thirty-eight miles.

In the case of Calvin S. Simonds, the report of desertion appears to have been made under a misapprehension of the facts, as the subsequent proofs show that he was sick and lay sick in the State of Arkansas with the Federal troops for the space covered in his absence.

In the case of Ab. H. Wilson, whose name the committee strike out, the further fact appears that he quit his regiment and joined another in the State of Kansas. Evidently he quit his command without the intention to return to it; and his attaching himself to another regiment, as a man free to enlist, is highly reprehensible and your committee cannot therefore relieve him.

With the bill thus amended, the committee report the same back, with a favorable recommendation.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendments of the committee, was agreed to.

W. C. MARSH.

Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3847) for the relief of W. C. Marsh; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DES MOINES RIVER LAND GRANT.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress of August 8, 1846, a grant of land was made to the then Territory of Iowa to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork; and whereas by joint resolution of Congress of March 2, 1861, and by act of Congress of July 12, 1862, said grant was extended so as to include the alternate sections designated by odd numbers lying within five miles of said river, between the Raccoon Fork and the northern boundary of the State of Iowa; and whereas the total grant of land to Iowa for the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines River under the acts of 1846, 1861, 1862, and 1871, it is alleged, amounts in the aggregate to 1,200,000 acres, (including school lands;) and whereas it is alleged that the Des Moines River Improvement Company have never fulfilled their contract, never improved the navigation of the Des Moines River, but actually seized upon the lands in question, commenced harassing litigation against bona fide settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws, who had patents for their lands, and actually did eject, confine, and imprison such in the prison of the city of Dubuque, in Iowa; and whereas it is alleged that said settlers, numbering several thousand and covering a tract of country one hundred and fifty miles in length, were settled on said lands previous to the passage of the resolution of 1861 and the act of 1862, granting the lands already occupied by them under the laws of the United States to the State of Iowa and its grantees; and whereas the Supreme Court of the United States did under the act of 1861 and 1862 declare that said settlers had no rights which the grantees of the State of Iowa, to wit, the (so-called) Des Moines River Improvement Company, were bound to respect; and whereas the General Assembly of the State of Iowa passed the following joint resolution which was approved on the 3d of February, A. D. 1876, to wit—

Whereas the title to the lands known as lands of the Des Moines River grant upand along the Des Moines River above the mouth of the Racoon Fork, after long years of litigation are still unsettled: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their utmost influence and so vote for such congressional legislation as will, as far as just and practicable, secure the settlers on the land of said grant titles to their homes and forever settle the title to and ownership of the lands of this grant.

Therefore, in consideration of the premises:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That a special committee, consisting of five members of this House, be appointed by the Speaker; and said committee are hereby ordered and instructed to make a thorough and searching investigation into the act of 1846, the joint resolution of 1861, the act of July 12, 1862, and the act of 1871, granting to the State of Iowa 1,200,000 acres of public lands along the Des Moines River, to see whether the object for which the land was granted to Iowa and its grantees has been carried out, namely, the improvement of the Des Moines River; also to find out the number of actual settlers who have been located on the Des Moines River lands previous to the acts of 1861, 1862, and 1871, and report back to the House, by bill or otherwise, at any time, the result of said investigation, with such recommendations for the relief of said settlers as the committee may deem proper and the facts of the investigation will warrant.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] to substitute a regular committee instead of a special committee to make this investigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought that this proposition was to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OLIVER. My proposition is for the appointment of a special committee of five. I think that is what is requested by the parties interested, and will be most satisfactory to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will consent to modify the resolution so as to devolve this duty upon the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not object. Let the resolution be modified by striking out "a special committee consisting of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker," and inserting "the Committee on Public Lands."

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to move that the House adjourn; but before submitting that motion I will yield to one or two gentlemen.

JANE PHILPOT.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3848) for the relief of Jane Philpot; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. CHICKERING.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 1909) for the relief of John W. Chickering, be passed.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to amend the record of John W. Chickering so that he shall appear on the rolls and records of the Army for rank as if he had been continuously in service. But nothing is to be paid to him for the interval of time from the 27th day of January, 1875, until the passage of the act.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. This bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make a report.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and others, called for the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the vote is taken on the motion to adjourn, I wish to say that the conference committee appointed by the two Houses on the post-office appropriation bill have reached a conclusion touching that bill. The papers are with the Senate; and that body has ordered the report of the conference committee to be printed, so that it will not come to the House to-day. I move therefore that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 82, noes 15; and accordingly (at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. FELTON: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Cohuttah post-office to Cohuttah Springs, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SAYLER: The petition of Louisa Merrill, for an increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE: The petition of Jane Philpot, for the pay, bounty, and allowance due her deceased son, Lewis Roork, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 5, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. P. H. BURGHENETTI of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

POST-OFFICE BIDS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 2684, in relation to bids in the Post-Office Department. It is very necessary that this bill shall pass. I think it will not consume any time.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator yield to me to make some reports?

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the bill be taken up, and then I will yield to morning business.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well.

Mr. MERRIMON. To what does the bill relate?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is a bill in relation to bids; what are called "straw" bids.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will now yield for morning business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy, guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 904) for the relief of William C. Nichols, late assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Francis Guilbeau, praying compensation for the use by the Government of certain buildings in San Antonio, Texas, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 974) for the relief of Francis Guilbeau, of San Antonio, Texas.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 820) for the relief of James Tebault and others, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 2693) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee, upon which the committee had made an adverse report and recommended the indefinite postponement of the bill, have instructed me to report the same back and again recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill, adhering to their former report.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 882) for the relief of Mrs. James K. Polk, of Nashville, Tennessee, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. If it leads to any debate I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, objection being made to its present consideration.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Carson, praying compensation for care of prisoners, &c., during the late war, have instructed me to report a bill and recommend its passage. I will state that a bill for this purpose has passed the Senate twice and the House once. If there is no objection this morning, as it is a very meritorious matter, I ask to have it put upon its passage. It is for a widow lady.

The bill (S. No. 973) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a military claim?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a printed report?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I will state that this bill passed the Senate twice heretofore and the House once, but fell in the closing hours of the session. It is for the relief of a widow lady for supplies furnished to prisoners in Mississippi. It is a meritorious matter. I think there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky, the sum of $2,636.40 in full satisfaction for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care, and attention furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by the military authorities of the United States in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 975) to amend section 1 of the act of May 12, 1864, for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 976) granting a pension to Norman Miller; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 19) granting ten days' leave of absence to such employés of the Government Printing Office as may desire to visit the centennial exhibition; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

NATIONAL WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer at this time a concurrent resolution. I wish to say before it is read that I believe if it were passed to-day it would be a matter of profound satisfaction to the great body of the people of the United States. I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to guide the United States of America safely through one hundred years of national life and to crown our nation with the highest blessings of civil and religious liberty: Therefore,

The Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled in the name of the people of the United States in reverent thankfulness acknowledge the fountain and source, the author and giver of all these blessings, and our dependence upon His providence and will; and

Whereas we recognize as our fathers did that George Washington, "first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," was one of the chief instruments of Divine Providence in securing American independence and in laying broad and deep the foundations of our liberties in the Constitution of the United States:

Therefore, as a mark of our sense of the honor due to his name and to his compatriots and associates, our revolutionary fathers,

We the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled in the name of the people of the United States at this the beginning of the second century of national existence do assume and direct the completion of the Washington monument in the city of Washington, and instruct the Committees on Appropriation of the respective Houses to propose suitable provisions of law to carry this resolution into effect

Mr. HAMLIN. I imagine that this resolution will provoke a debate. If it does not, I am willing to waive any objection to it, but I have a bill before the Senate and I am not willing to be crowded out by a discussion that would consume all the morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us consider this resolution. It will be agreed to unanimously, I am sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sees no Senator rising to debate it.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to unanimously.

GILDEROY M. HARDY.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] reported this morning from the Committee on Claims a bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy, guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased. It is an important matter and it will take but a moment to pass it. I ask that the bill be taken up at this time.

Mr. HAMLIN. If we are through with morning business, I now insist on the consideration of House bill No. 2684. It is an important bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to say to the Senator from Maine that the matter to which the Senator from Indiana calls attention is a bill to which there can be no objection on earth. It is for the benefit of some minor children who are suffering for the loss of a check issued at the Pension Bureau. It has been lost and cannot be supplied, because for a larger amount than the law allows.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well; but I have a bill in my hand which interests every tax-payer in the United States. I hope it will be first considered, and then I will join with the greatest pleasure in helping the Senator to get up the bill to which he refers.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly I have no right to insist on the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I must insist now upon the consideration of the bill which is before the Senate.
